Ood Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English M. Caluines booke of the institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluine first wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of small volume, and since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new encreases, still protesting at every edition himselfe to be one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing doe growe in profiting, and with their profiting doe proceede in writing. At length having in many his other works trauelled about exposition of sundry booke of the Scriptures, and in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him and not in any other Methode, were not so ready for the readers use, he therefore entred into this purpose to enlarge this booke of Institutions, and therein to treat of all those titles and common places largely, with this intent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other booke to treate of any such caufe, he would not newly amplifie his booke of commentaries and expostions therewith, but referre his reader wholly to this storehouse & treasure of that sort of divine learning. As age and weaknesse grew vpon him, so he hastened his labor, and according to his petition to God, he in maner ended his life with his worke, for he liued not long after. So great a jwell was meete to be made most benefciall, that is to say, applied to most common use. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queenes Maiesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the Church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deere friends of worthy memorie Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitechurch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, and Latin tongues, the other her Highnes Printer of the booke of common praire. I performed my worke in the house of my saide friend Edward Whitechurch, a man well knowne of uprigh hart and dealing, an ancient zealous Gospeller, as plaine and true a friend as ever I knew liuing, and as desirous to do any thing to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my saide first edition of this booke, I considered how the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to pack great plenty of mater,
THE PREFACE.

Because in small roomes of words, yea and those so circumstently and precisely ordered, to avoid the cauillations of such, as for ennitie to the truth therein conteined, would gladly seeke & abuse all advantages which might be found by any oversight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothing might well be added without idle superfluities, and againe so niciely pared that nothing could be minished without taking away some necessarie substance of matter therein express'd. This manner of writing, beside the peculiar termes of artes and figures, and the difficultie of the matters themselfes, being throughout interlaced with the Schoolemens controverfies, made a great hardnesse in the authors owne booke, in that toong wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and easie, insomuch that it sufficeth not to reade him once, vnlesse you can be content to reade in vaine. This consideration encombr'd me with great doubtfulnesse for the whole order and frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I have that of necessitie the hardnesse in the translation must needs be greater than was in the toong wherein it was originally written. If I should leave the course of words, and grant my selfe libertie after the naturall maner of my owne toong, to say that in English which I conceaued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceiued how hardly I might escape error, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, how perilous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his wordes. And they that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, doe know that not the onely grammaticall construction of wordes sufficeth, but the very building and order to obserue all advantages of vheemence or grace, by placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true setting forth of a writers uinde. In the end, I rested vpon this determination, to follow the wordes so neere as the phrase of the English toong would suffer me. Which purpose I so perfourned, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it should not exceede the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beside all other commoditie that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefit is moreouer provided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine toong (which is at this time to be wished in manie of thole men for whose profession this booke most fitly serveth) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such few places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnish themselves with understanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not only trust mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence throughout the whole booke with conference and overlooking.
of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their judgement, I did both satisfy mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approoving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be delivered him but sound, unmingled, and uncorrupted doctrine, even in such sort as the author himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned, and vertuous man M. David Whitehead (whome I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining every sentence throughout the whole booke. Beside all this, I priviately required many & generally all men with whom I euer had any talk of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfy them or to amend it. Since which time I haue not beeue advertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause, why not onely at the second and third time but also at this impression, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In deede I perceived many men well minded and studious of this booke, to require a table for their eafe and furtherance. Their honest desire I haue fulfilled in the second edition, and haue added thereto a plentifulfull table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principal matters discoursed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and under every title is set forth a briefe summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, and Section or division of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and proceed. And for the reader finding thereof, I haue caused the number of the Chapters to be set upon every leafe in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsuall figures of Algorisme. And now at this last publishing, my friends by whole charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romane letter and smaller volume, with divers other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefite. Moreover, whereas in the first edition the euill maner of my scribling hand, the enterlining of my Copie, and some other causes well known among workemen of that facultie, made very many faultes to passe the Printer, I haue in the second impression causd the booke to be composed by the printed copie, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needs be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my selfe doe knowe aboue three hundred faultes amended. And now at this last Printing, the composing after a printed copie bringeth some ease, and the diligence vsed about the correction, having beeue right faithfully looked vnto, it cannot be but much more truly set foorth. This also is performed, that the volume being smaller, with a letter faire and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the Printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commoditie (good Readers) is provided for. Now reflect your owne diligence for your owne profit in studying it. To spend many words in commending the worke itselfe, were needless: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vtruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men have written bookes of common places of our religion, as Melancthon, Sarcerius, and other, whose works are very good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the consenting judgement of those that understand the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Calvin, both for his substantiall sufficiency of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deep and strong confusion of all olde and new heresies: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable bookes for all students of Christian divinity. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glorie of God, and for your benefite, that you may have this profit of my trauell, so I beseech you let me have this vie of your gentleness, that my doings may be construed to such good ende as I have meant them: and that if any thing mislike you by reason of hardnesse, or any other cause that may seeme to be my defect, you will not forthwith condemn the worke, but reade it over; in which doing you will finde (as many have confesséd to me that they have founde by experience) that those things which at the first reading shall displeafe you for hardnesse, shall be found so easie as so hard matter woulde suffer, and for the most part more easie than some other phrase which shoulde with greater loosenesse and smoother sliding away deceive your understanding. I confess in deede it is not finely and pleasantly written, nor cariech with it such delightfull grace of speech as some great wise men have bestowed upon some foolisher things, yet it containeth sound truth set foorth with faithfull plainnesse without wrong done to the authors meaning: and so if you accept and vse it, you shall not faile to have great profite thereby, and I shall thinke my labour very well employed.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his soueraigne Lord, John Calvne witheth peace and saluation in Christ,

When I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought nothing leffe (most noble King) than to write anything that afterward should be presented to your maiestie. Onely my minde was to teach certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeal of religion might be instructed to true godlines. And this travaile I tooke principally for my countreymen the Frenchmen, of whom I understand very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I saw verry few that had rightly received so much as any little knowledge of him. And that was my meaning, the booke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceived, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre prevailed in your Realme, that in it there is no room for some doctrine: I thought I should do a thing worth my traual, all in one worke both to give an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: whereby ye may leere what manner of doctrine that is, against which these furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sword and fire. For I will not shame to confess, that I have in this worke comprehended in manner the summe of that selfe same doctrine against which they cry out, that it ought to be punished with imprisonment, banishment, condemnation without judgement, and with fire, that it ought to be chased away by land and sea. I know indeede with how hauious informations they have filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hateful unto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to weight, that there shall be no innocencie, neither in words nor deeds, if it may be enough to accuse. Truly if any, to bring the same in hatred shall allledge that this doctrine whereof I now go about to yeeld account unto you, hath beene long agoe condemned by consent of all degrees, and attainted by many judgements already given in judicitial courts, all that he faith shal amount to no more but that it hath partly beene violently thrown downe by the bannings and power of the adversaries thereof, and partly beene traiterously and fraudulently oppressed with their lies and subtle practises and slanderes. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause, bloudie sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraud, that it is without defending accused of sedition and enuing doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfullie complain of these things, you your selfe can beare witness, most noble King, with how lying slanderers it is daily accused unto you: as that it tendeth to no other end but to winthe from Kings their scepters out of their hands, to throwe downe all judges, feates and judgements, to subuerie all orders and civil governements, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to abolish all laws, to rende all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things upside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthily judge it with the maintainers thereof, woorthy of a thousand fars and gallows. Who can now maintaine that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleeved? Lo, this is the cause that all degrees agree and conspire to the condemning of vs and our doctrine. They that sit to judge, being vanished with with this affection pronounce for sentences their foreconceived determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they have well enough discharged their duties, if they command no man to be drawn to execution, but such as are founde guilty either by their owne confesstion or by sufficient witness. But of what faults of that condemned doctrine, saie they, But by what law condemned? Herein shoulde have stand the succour of defence for them, not to denie the doctrine it selfe, but to maintaine it for true, but heere is all libertie onc to matter, vterly cut off from vs.

Wherefore I do not vnwisely require, most victorius King, that it may please you to take into your owne hand the whole bearing of the cause which hitherto hath been troublesomel handled or rather carelessely tost with out all order of lawe, more by outrageous beate then iudicall gravitie. Neither yet thinke, that I heere goe about to make mine owne private defence, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrey, to which although I beare such affection of natural love as becometh me; yet as the cause owne is, I not misconcedently want it. But I take upon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day having bene by all meanes tost and troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaied cause, and that indeed rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharises than by your owne knowledge. But howe that commend to passe, it is not heere needful to tell: truly it lieth in great diffuses. For thus farre have the vngodly prevaile that the truth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vn-regarded: as for the fickle poor Church, it is either wafted with cruel slaughters, and so driven away with banishments, or dismaited with threateninges and terrours, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage and fierceenes as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending and the ruine which themselves have made. In the mean time no man steppeth forth to set himselfe in defence against such furres. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to savour the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskillfulness of ignorant men. For thus the good natures men forsooth do speake, calling that error and vnskillfulness which they know to be the most certaine truth of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so dispisde but that he hath vouchsafed to communicate to them the mysteries, of his heavenly wisdome. So much are all ashamed of the Gobell. It shall be your office (most noble king) not to turne away your cares nor your minde from vs a defence: specially when so great a matter is in question: namely howe the glory of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the truth of God may keepe her honor, how Christ may have his kingdome preserved whole among vs. This is a matter worthie for your cares, worthie for your judgement, worthie for your royall throne. For, even this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge himselfe in the governance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now vs a kingdome but a robberie, which reigneth not to this end that he may seme the glory of God. And he is deceived that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdome, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holy word: forasmuch as the heavenly Oracle cannot proce waine, whereby is it proclaimed, that the people shall be scattered abroad where prophesie faileth. Neither ought the contempt of our basenesse to withdrawe you from this purpose. We verily knowe right well, how poor and abject fickle men we bee, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrementes and outcastes of the worlde, or whatsoever viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for vs to glory upon before God, but his onely mercie whereby we are without any descending received into the hope of eternal salvation: and before men, nothing but our weakenesse, which among them it is taken for a most great shame to confess so much as in countenance. But our doctrine must be advanced bee above all glory of the world, must stand vnunquishable above all power: because it is not ours, but the doctrine of the living God and of his Christ, whom the Father hath appointed king to bear rule even from sea to sea, and from the riuers euent to the ends of the earth: and so to bear rule, that striking the whole earth with the onely rod of his mouth he may break it with all the iron and brassen strength, with all the golden and siluer glistening thereof, as it were.

were potters vessels: as the prophete prophesie of the royaltie of his kingdom. Our adversaries in deed doe criu out to the contrarie, and say that we faifie pretende the word of God, whereas we be most wicked corrupters. But here this is not only a malicious slander, but also a not-able shamelesse, you yourselves by reading our confession, may according to your wifesome judge. Yet here it is so good to say somewhat either to move you to willingnesse and heedfulness, or at the least to prepare you a waie to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all prophesie to be framed to the agreeableness of faith, hath set a most sure rule whereby the expanding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is already in our hands. For what doth better or more fitly agree with faith than to acknowledge our selues naked of all vertue, that of God we may be clothed? empty of all good, that of him we may be filled? the bondservants of some, that of him we may be made free? blinde, that of him we may be enlightened? lame, that of him we may be made straight? feele, that of him wee may be vpholden? to take from our selues all matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious onelie, and in him we may glory? When we say these and such like things, they interrupt vs and crie out: that by this meane is overthrown I wrote not what blinde light of nature, stained preparations, freewill, workes meritorious of eternall salvation, together with their surreterations: because they cannot abide that the whole praise and glory of all goodnes, vertue, righteousness, and widom should remaine in God. But we read not that they were blamed that have drawnen too much out of the fountain of liuing water: on the contrary side they are sharply rebuked which have digged to themselves pittes, broken pittes, which are not able to hold water. Againe, what is more agreeable with faith, than to promise to themselves that God will bee to them a fauourable Father, where Christ is acknowledged to bee a brother and procurer of favour? than assuredlie to look for all things joyfull and prosperous at his hande, whose vspeakable love towards vs hath proceeded so farre, that hee hath not spared his only begotten sonne, but that hee gave him for vs? than to rest in sure looking for salvation and eternall life, where wee thinke upon Christ given of the Father, in whom such treasures are hidden? Here they step in against vs, and crie out that this certaintie of affiance is not without arroganie and presumption. But as nothing of our selues, so all things ought we to presume of God: and we are for another reason spoilt of vaine glory, but that wee shouldn learne to glory in the Lorde. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the partes of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kinds of wicked men, unless you plainly finde that we are in trouble and raised at, because we put our trust in the living God: because we believe that this is the eternall life, to knowe one true God, and his whomse bee both fent Jesus Christ. For this hope, some of us are bound in iron, some are whipp'd, some are carried about in stocks, some are condemned without judgement, some are most cruelly tormentened, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terrible accurrend, some with flanders, and handled in most lewdnesse wife. Now looke upon our adversaries (I speak of the degree of priests, at whose becke and will the other exercise enmities against vs) and consider with me a little while, with what zeal they be carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the Scriptures, and which ought to bee holde certaine among all men, they easielie give leave both to themselves and other to bee ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they think that it maketh small matter what evene man believe or not beleue concerning God and Christ, so that he do with an unexpressed faith (as they call it) submisse his minde to the judgement of the Church: neither are they much moved, if it happen that the glory of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift up his finger against the supremacie of the Apostliske sea, and autoritie of our holy mother the Church. Why therefore doe they with so great cruelty and fircesirnesse fight for the Massee, Purgatorio, Pilgrimages, and such trifles, so farre forth, that they hate that without most expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godliness cannot vndeme, whereas yet they proue not that any of these things come out of the word of God? Why so, but because their belie is their God, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely bee no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them do plenteously glute themselves, and other

some liue with gnawing of poore crusifes, yet they live all of one Pot, which without these warning helpees shoul not onely waxe cold, but also throughly freeze. Therefore how much more eneric of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnestly warrer he is for their faith. Finally they all endeavour themselves to this, to keepe still either both kingdoms safe, and their belly full: but of pure zeal none of them sheweth ane token, be it never so little. Neither yet so doe they cease to flander our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it new, and lately forged: they cavil that it is doubtfull, and vncertaine: they demaunde by what miracles it is confirmed: they ask whether is be meete that it should presvail against the content of so many holie fathers, and the most ancient custome: they preffe upon vs to confesse it to be schismaticall, which moo-newth warrre against the Church, or that the Church hath liuen dead in manie ages in which no such thing hath bene heard of. Last of all they say that there neede no arguments, for (saiue they) it may by the fruities be judged of what sort it is, namelye which hath bred so huge a heap of sectes, so manie turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truely fulle case it is for them, to triumph upon a forsoke cause before the light-becoming and ignorant multitude. But if we might also have our turne likewise allowed us to speake, verily this sharpe heate would soone be cooled wherewith they doe so with full mouth and as licentiousely as unpunisheisome against vs.

First, whereas they call it new, they doe great wrong to God, whose holie word deserveth not to be accused of newness. To them in deed I nothing doubt that it is new, to whom Christ is new, and his Gospell is new. But they which knew that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Jesus Christ did for our sakes, and for the same sake of Inisification, shall finde nothing newe among vs. Whereas it hath long liuen hidden unknowen, and burned: that is the fault of the ungodliness of men. Now it is by the bountifulnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receive against the title of ancientie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springs this, that they take it for doubtfull and uncertaine. This verily is it which the Lordes by his prophet complaineth, that the ox knew his owner, and the ass his masters stall, but his people knew not him. But howsoever they mocke at the vncertaintye of it: if they were driven to seale their owne doctrine with their owne bloud, and with loafe of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our affiance, which dreads not the terrorrs of death, nor yet the very judgement feate of God.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deal unreasonable with vs. For we coin no newe Gospell, but bulde first the selfe same Gospell, for confirming of the truth whereof all the myra-cles do serve that ever Christ and his Apostles have done. But this thing they have speciall above vs, that they can enuie this day confirm their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they allege myrauces, which may weaken a minde otherwise well stablisshed: they are so either trifling and woorhie to be laughed at, or waione and lying. And yet, although they were never so monstrours, they ought not to have beene of anie value against the worde of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in euery place and at euery time to be ballyed, whether it be by myrauces or by naturall orde of things. This saue colour might peraduenture have made the better seewe, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawfull ende and use of miracles. For, Marketh teacheth that the signes which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it: Likewise Luke also faith that the Lord did beare wittnesse to the worde of his grace, when signes and woonders were shewed by the handes of the Apostles. Wherewith wholly agreeith that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, salvation was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare wittnesse to it with signes, and woonders, and divers powers. But these things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroying of the credite of the Gospell? those things which are appointed onely to stablishe the truth, shall we apply it to confirming of lies? Therefore it is meet that the doctrine, which (as the Evangelist faith) goeth before myrauces, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marks, if it tend not to the seeking of the glory of men, but of God. As Christ affirmeth this to be the proof of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully esteemed which are drawn to any other end than to glorify the name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Satan hath his miracles, which although they be beguiling deceits rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceive the ignorant and unwise. Magicians and enchanters have bin always famous in miracles: wonderful miracles have nourished idolatrie, which yet do not prove to us, that the superstition of Magicians & idolaters is lawful. And with this battering ram in old time the Donatists did make the simplicity of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we do now make the same answer to our adversaries, which Augustine then made to the Donatists: 'that the Lord God made vs wary against such miracle workers, when he foretold that there should come false prophets, which with lying signs and divers wonders, should if it were possible, bring the elect into errour. And Paul hath given warning that the kingdom of Antichrist should be with all power, and signs, and lying wonders. But these miracles they are done not of idols, nor of forcers, nor of false prophets, but of the saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of Satan, to transfigure himselfe into an angle of light. In old time the Egyptians worshipped Serenity which was buried among them, with sacrifices & other divine honors. Did not they abuse the holy prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tomb, they obtained that they thought the healing of the scaring of the serpents to be the most reward thereof. What shall we say, but that this hath beene and ever shall be the most just vengeance of God, to sende strength of illusion to them that have not received the love of truth, that they may beleeue lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and these certain, and not subject to cavillations. For as miracles which they bring forth for themselves, they are mere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanities.

Moreover, they do slanderously set the Fathers against us (I mean the ancient Fathers and the writers of the age as yet more incorrupt) as though they had them for maintainers of their vnaugulions by whose authoritie if the debate were to ended, the better part of the victory (to speake even most modestie) would advance to our side. But whereas many things have beene excellently well and wisely written of those Fathers, and in some thing, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good natural children forsooth, according to the rightnesse, that they have, both of wit, judgement, and minde, do worshipping, only their faults and errors: and those things which are well spoken, they either mark not, or fame as if, they knew them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may say, that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gold of the fathers. Then they oppose vs with importunate crying out against vs, as defiers and enemies of the Fathers. But we doe not so defie them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could verie easie prove by their confessing voices, the greater part of these things that we say at this day. But we forke their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, to serue us, not to have dominion over vs: and that we are Christes alone, whom we must obey in all things without exception. Who so keepeth not this choice, shall have nothing certaine in Religion: forasmuch as these holy men were ignorant of manie things, doe oftentimes strive one with another, and sometimes fight with themselves. Not without cause (sake) they we are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the olde bounds which our Fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fieldes, and the obedience of Faith, which ought to be so framed, that it forget her people and the house of her father. If they have so great delight in these allegories, why do they not rather expound the Apostles, than any other to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawful to plucke up for so did Hierome expound it, whose words they have registred among their Canon. But if they will have the bounds of the same fathers, whom they menne, to be sedulously kept, why do they so often as they live, so licenciously passe them? Of the number of the fathers they were, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not nor drinketh, and that therefore he needed neither cups nor dishes: the other, said, that the holy things require not gold, and that those things please not with gold, which are not bought with gold. Therefore they passe the bounds, which are in the holy things so much delighted with golde, stur, inorae, marble, precious stones and and silkes, and thinkes that God is not rightly worshipped, unleashe altogether they be dissolvously set out with exquise gogges and snuffes, or rather with outragious excess. A Fater was he, which saide, that he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they paffe the boundes, when they assuere the soule that tafteth flesh in libert. Fathers were they of whom the one said, that a Monke which laboureth not with his hands, and yet is as well as a violent taker, or (if you will) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawfull for monkes to line other mans goods, although they be continually bufied in contemplations, in prayers, in studie. This bound also they have paffe, when they placed the idle and barrell bellies of monks in stews and brothel houses to be fatted with other mens substance. A Father was he, which said, that it is a horrid abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ, or of any saint in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiasticall Council, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on walls. They are farre from holding themselves within these boundes, when they leaue not one corner without images. Another Father counselled, that having done the duty of natural kindnesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These boundes they break, when they cast into men a continuall carefullnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testifieth that the substance of bread and wine in the Sacrament of the Supper remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lorde Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man joined with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which saith that after the words of the Lorde rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, that it may be transubstantiated into his body and blood. Fathers were they which they delivered to the whole Church but one Sacrament of Thankesgivings, and as they debarring from it wicked and hainous enmity doers: so did greenely condemn all those which being present, did not communicate of it. How farre have they remoued those bounds, when they fill not only Churches, but also private houses with their masses, and admit all men to look upon them, and every man so much more gladly as he more largely paiteth, how vnecleane and wicked foarer they bee: but allure no man to faith in Christ, and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe boastingly set out to sale their owne worke for the grace and merite of Christ? Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they shoulde bee altogether debarring from the vse of the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the one kind, abstained from the other. And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the Christian people the blood of the Lorde ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commanded to shed their owne blood. These boundes also they have taken away, when they have by an insolvable lawe commanded the selues same thing which the one of these Fathers punitished with excommunication, and the other reproved with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to bee rashnesse to determine anything of a doubfull matter on the one side or the other, without cleere and evident witnesse of the Scripture. This bound they forgot, when they stablished so many constitutions, so many canons, so many maisterly determinations, without any words of God.

A Fater was he, which among other heresies reproached Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fastinges. This bound also they have farre pased, when they commanded fasting with most straight lawes. A Father was he, which denied that marriage ought to bee forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a man lying with his owne wife to be adulterie: and Fathers were they, which agreed to his authority. Beyond these bounds have they gone, when they severely enjoin unmarrried life to their sacrificers. A Father was he which judged, that onely Christ ought to be heard, of whom it is said, Hear him: and that we ought not to have regardes, what other men which were before vs, have saide or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commanded. This bound neither doe they appoint to themselves, nor doe suffer other to haue it appointed them, when they set both oure selves and other any masters whatsoever they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that the Church ought not to set it selfe before Christ, because he alwaies judged truly: but the indiges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceived. They breaking through this bound also, finde not to affirmate that the whole authoritie of the Scripture hanggest upon the

the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers have with one heart accused, and with one mouth pronounced it abominable, that the holy Word of God should be entangled with the subtleties of Sophisters, and bravings of Logitians. Doe they holde themselves within these bounds, when they se about nothing else in their whole life, but with endless strifes, and more than sophistical brabblings to wrap and encomber the simplicities of the Scripture? So that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, and should heare such an arte of brawling, which these men call Speculative Divinitie, they would belewe that nothing lese is done than any dissipation had of God. But my tale should spread it selfe beyond due bounds, if I would reckn on how boldly these men shake off the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be. Truly both monethes and yeeres would be too little for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperate shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we sticke not to passe the ancient bounds.

But now whereas they call vs to custome, they nothing breuaille. For we should be most vnjustly dealt with, if we should be druen to yeeld to custome. Truely if the judgements of men were right, Custome should bee taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to bee done of manie, by and by obtained the right of a Custome. But the state of men hath scarceley at any time beeene in so good case, that the better things plesed the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the private vices of manie hath beeene made a publike error, or rather a common confent of vices, which now these good men would have to stande for a lawe. Who so have eies do see that not onely one se of evils hath overflowed, manie poisonous pestilences have invaded the world, that all things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be utterly despaire, or we must lay hande vnto, or rather use violence upon so great evils. And remedie is by no other reason driven away, but because we have now long time accustomed vs to evils. But be it that publike error have place in matters of common weale; yet in the kingdom of God his unie truth is to be herd and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeeres, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in old time Haue taught the elect of God, that they should not say Consparing, to all things in which the people continue consparing: that is to saie, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor should fear and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lorde of hosts, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list object against us both past and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lorde of hosts, we will not be much afraide. For whether it be that manie ages have conferred to like vngodliness, bee is strong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one se felse same wickednesse, he hath by experience taunght what is the end of them that offend with the multitude, when he did with a general over flowing destroy the whole kinde of men, preferring Noe with a small houshold, which should by his faith being but one man condemn the whole world. Finally an euill custome, is none other then a common pestilence, in which they do neuerthelesse die that doe with compaine of a multitude. Moreover they ought to have considered that which Cyprian faith in certaine places, that they which sinned by ignorance, although they cannot cleare them of all faults, yet may seeme after some manner excusable: but who so obstinately refuse the truth offered by the grace of God, they have nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they do not drive vs to so hard a fireight with it, to compell vs to conspire, that either the Church hath lien dead a certaine time, or that we have controversie against the church. Truely the church of Christ hath liued and shall liue, so long as Christ shall vaine at the right hand of the father: by whose hand she is upholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power bee kepeth her safterie. For he will undoubtedly performe that which he hath once promised, that he will be present with his own until the ending of the world. Againstst it now we have no warre at all. For we doe with one consent together with all the people of the faithfull honour and worship the one God and Christ the Lord, in like sort as he hath alway bin worshipped of all the godly. But they themselves not a little way erre from the truth, truth, when they acknowledge no church, but which they see with present eye, and go about to compass it about with those bounds in which it is not enclosed. Upon these points hangeth our controversy: first, that they affirm that the forms of the Church is alwaies appeaing & to be seen; then, that they set the same forms in the face of the church of Rome, & in the order of their prelates. We on the contrary side affirm, that the church may consist of no appeaing forme, and that the forme it self is not contained in that outward shewing shewe, which they foolishly base in admiration, but hath a farre other merke, namely, the true preaching of the words of God, and the right manifration of sacraments. They are in a rage, unless the church may be alwaies pointed out with a finger. But how if happened it in the people of the Jews to bee so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme think we to have shewed, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the coming of Christ hath it lain hidden without forme? How since that time hath it beene so oppressed with wars, seditions, and hereies, that it shined out on no side? If they had lived at that time, would they have beleaved that there was any Church? But it was saide to Helias, that there were preserved seven thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to bee doubles to vs but that Christ hath alwaies reigned in earth since hee ascended into heaven. But if the godly had then fought any discernable forme with their eyes, should they not by and by have beene discouraged? And verily Hilarie accounted it even alredie in his time for a most great fault, that being occu- pied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking under that visor. For thus he saith: One thing I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the love of words, ye do ill worship the Church of God in houses and build- ings: under them ye do ill shrift in the name of peace. It is doubtfull that in those Antichrist shall sit? Mountains & woods and lake, & prisons, and caues are safer for me. For in these the prophets, when they were either abiding or thrown into them, did prophesie. But what doth the world at this day honor in his horned bishops, but that is thought them to be holy prelates of reli- gion, whom it feeth to be heads over great Cities? Away therefore with such foolish adorning. But rather let vs leane this to the Lord, for as much as hee alone knoweth who bee his, and sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I grant) a horrible vengeance of God upon the earth. But if the wickednes of men do defende, why doe we seeke to withstand the just vengeance of GOD? In such wise the Lorde hath in times past taken vengeance of the unthankfulness of men. For because they would not receive his truth, and had quenched his light, bee suffered them being blinded in signe, both to bee mocked with lies full of absurdities, and to be drowned in depe darkenesse, so that there was no face of the true Church to bee seen. Yet in the meantime hee caused his both being scattered abroad and lying hidden in the middle of errors and darkenesse, from destruction. And no man cullle. For hee cullle to save both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning aun. But whereas they would have the forme of the Church to bee judged by I wote not what vaine pompous shewe: how perillus that is, I will rather point unto than declare, least I should drawe out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolish see, and the bishops that are anointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and mitres, doe represent the church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot erre. How so? because they are pastors of the Church, and consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israel also Pastors? But Aaron and his sons after that they were made priests, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the newer hundred Prophets which lied to Ahab, have represented the Church? But the Church was on Michcas side, being alone but one man alone, and unregarded, but out of whose mouth came truth. Did not the false Prophets in resemblance bear the name and face of the church, when they did with one violent assault rise vp against Jeremey, and with threatening boasted that it was not possible that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wise man, the words from the Prophet? Jeremey alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophets, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the lawe should perish.

from the priest, counsel from the wiseman, and the word from the Prophet. Did not such a glittering show shine in that council which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take advice together for the killing of Christ? Now let them go & slake feast in the outward vis-touf, that they may make Christ & all the prophets of God, schismatics, & on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speak as they think, let them faithfully answer me, in what nation and place they think the church remained since the time that by the decree of the council at Bithle, Eugenius was thrust downe and deproted from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the council, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawful, and summoned not only of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinallers and Bishops, which had with him practisid the dissolution of the Council. Yet afterward being borne vp by the favour of Princes, hee recovered his papacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had beene orderly made by the authoritie of a generaLL and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke; seeing that hee himselfe was appeased with a Cardinallers hat, as it were a barking dog with a pece of bread cast unto him. Out of the bosome of these heretickes, rebelles, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots and Priestis, that have beene since. Here they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they give the name of the church? will they deny that the council was general, which wanted nothing to the outward majestie: namely, which being solemnly summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all things, continued in the same dignitie to the last end? Will they conforme Eugenius with all his company a schismematike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the church, or they all as many as are of them shall be of vs accounted schismatics, which withoutly and willingly have been ordered of heretickes. If it had never before beene knowne, that the church is not bound to outward pomps, they themselves may be to vs a large profe, which under that glorious title of the church have so long so prouidely boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the church. I speake not of their manners, and those tragicall doings whereby their whole life swarmed so full, because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leisure to read our writings, you shall plainly know that the verie doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for which they say that they see the church is a deadly butcherie of soules, the firebrand, mine, and destruction of the church.

Finally they do not wrightly enough, when they doe state falsely theirse, how great troubles, upruses, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawnen with it, and what frustes it now beareth in many. For the blame of these evils is unworthy laid upon it which ought rather to have beene imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certain natural property of the word of God, that whensoever it riseth vp, Satan is never quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is disdained from lying doctrines, which do easily shewe forththemselves when they are receiued with favourable ears of all men, and are heard of the world rejoicing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all things were drowned in depe darkenesse, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and took his pleasures like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should bee else do but laugh and plaie being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdom? But when the light shinning from above somewhat scattered abroad his darkenesse, when that strong man troubled and afrighted his kingdom, then he began to shake off his wounded draughtsman, and hastily to arm himselfe. And first he stirred vp the forces of men, whereby he might violently oppose the truth beginning to shine. Which when he nothing prevaied, he turned to subtle entrappings. He stirred vp discontents & disagreements of doctrines by his Catabaptists, and other monstrous lewd men, whereby he might darken it and at length utterely quench it. And now hee continueth to asyle it with both engines. For he travelleth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede: and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and beare fruite. But all this hee doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craft against vs, that he should not take vs unwares, as he armed vs with sufficient defences against all his enemies. But howe great maliciousnes is it to laye upon the word of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which cannot and rebellions men do raise vp, or of the sects which deceivers do raise against it? Yet it is no newe exemplo. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel, Christ was esceamed of the Jews a seditious man. The Apostles were accused of making a commotion among the people. What other thing do they which at this day do father upon vs all the troubles, vproves and contentions that boyle vp against vs? But what is to be anfwered to such, Elias hath taught vs, namely that it is not we that scatter errors or stir vp vproves: but it is they themselves that wraske against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beare backe their raflinesse, so againe we ought to meete with the weaknesses of other, who oftentimes happen to be mowed with such offences, and in their dismaying to waier. But let them, to the end that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discourag'd, know that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same things that now happen unto vs. There were unlearned and rasled men, which were to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were defiers of God, which when they heard that sin abounded, the end that grace might more abound, by and by oblied, we will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithful are not under the law, they by and by answered, We will then sinne, because we are not under the law, but under grace. There were that accused him as an exboriter to euill. There entred prouidy many false Apostles to destroy the churches which he had built. Some by enmie and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospell thinking to add more affliction to his bands. Somewhere the Gospell not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the things of Iesvs Christ. Some went backeward, dogges to their vomits, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the libertine of the Spirite to the licentiousnesse of the fleth. Many brethren crept in, by whom there came afterward great danger to the godly. Among the brethren themselves were many flirfer vsed vp. What should the Apostles have done in this case? Should they not either have dispersed for a time, or rather altogether have quenched and forsoke the Gospell, which they saw to be the seedeplot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for help in such distresses this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set unto the rume and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be stoned against. With which offence they being armed, went forward boldly through all dangers of vproves and offences. With the same thought we also ought to be uphouden, forasmuch as Paul testifieth that this is the perpetuall property of the Gospell to be the favour of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordain'd to this use that it should be the favour of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the salvation of the faithful: which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vunthankfulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefite of God, and turne that to our owne destruction which ought to have beene to vs the only defence of our safety.

But now I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reports nothing move you, by which our adversaries trauell to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this new Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is huntsed for and sought but at occasion of seditions, and unpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the Author of disson, but of peace: and the Sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the works of the Dwell. And we are unworthyly accused of such desires, whereof we never came any suspicion were it never so small. It is likely that we forsooth doe praifize the overthowing of kingdoms, of whom there hath never beene heard anie one seditiones word, whose life hath ever beene knowne quiet and simple, when we lived onder you, and which now being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your Kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behaviour although many things may be found faultie, yet ther is nothing worthie of so great reproch, neither have we with so ill success (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospell, but that our life may be to these backbeaters an examplar of chastitie, liberalite, and mercy.

Mercy, temperance, patience, modesty, and whatsoever other virtue. Verily it is by the proofe it selfe evident, that we doe unfeinly feare and worship God, for as much as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life & our death, and hence it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witness of innocencenc and sinfull vprightnesse, in whom this only thing was punished with death, which ought to have beene accounted for a singular praise. But if any under pretence of the Gospell doe shewe vp tumultes (as hitherto it hath not beene found that there have beene any such in your Realme) if any pretend the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I have knowne many) there be lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their deservings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not guiltie of for the wickednes of naughtie men. Thus haue you (O King) the venemous minifice of the slaunderers largely enough declared, that you may not with an care of too easie beleefe bend to their reportes. I feare me also least it be too largely set out, for as much as this presface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole Booke of defense, whereby I intended not to make a defense in deede, but onely to mollifie your minde aforehand to gaine audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shall be able to recover the favor thereof, if you shall once haue without displeasure and troublous affection read over this our confession, which we will to be in stead of a defense for vs to your Maiestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious doe so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused men, to speake for themselves: and if these outragious furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with pruning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shall in deede, as sheepe approued to the slaughter, be brought to all extremeties, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and waite for the strong hand of the Lord: which shall without doubt be present in time, and stretch forth it selfe armed, both to deliver the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the defapers, which now triumph with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kings stablish your throne with rightoufnesse, and your seate with equitie, most noble King.

At Basile the first day of August, in the yeare 1536.
T he first setting out of this work, because I did not looke for that success, which the Lorde of his vnmea-surable goodnes hath given, I had (as men use to do in small works) for the more part lightly passed it over.
But when I understood that it was receiv'd with that favour of all the godly, which I never durst have deired, much lesse have hoped for; as I verily felt in my hart that much more was given to me than I had desired, so I thought it should be a great vnthankfulness if I should not at the leaft after my slender abilitie endeavor to answer to favourable affections toward me, and which of them selves provoked my diligence. And this I attempted not one-ly in the second setting forth of it: but howe ever since that time the worke hath bin imprinted, so oft hath it bin enriched with some en-crease. But although I did not then repent me of the labour that I had imployed; yet I never held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I have given you that which may be allowed by all your judgements. Truely with how great endeavor I have applied my selfe to the doing of this service to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an euident witnes, that this last winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had summo-med me to death, how much more the sicknes enforced upon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leave this booke to overlie me, which might make some part of thankfull recompence to so gentle provoking of the godly. I had rather indeed it had bin done sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroad in good season, when I shall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentiful fruict than it hath done heretofore to the church of God. This is my onely desire. And truly full ill it were with me, if I did not holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despite the judgements of men, whether they be the foolish and frowward judgements of the vnskillfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly fetel my mind to the endeavour both of enlarging his kingdom, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleere in mine owne conscience, & haue himselfe and the angels to witnes with me, that since I tooke upon me the office of a teacher in the church, I haue tended to none other purpose but that I might profit the Church in maintaining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath bin snatched at, bitten and torne in sundrie with more slanders than I. When my Epistle
To the Reader.

Epistle was now in printing, I was certainly informed that at Augsburg where the assemblie of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my revolting to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily received in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignorant of many trials had of my stedfastnes, which trials as they shake off to foule a flander, so they shoulde with all indifferent and gentle judges haue defended me from it. But the duell with his whole route is de cued if in oppreting me with filthy lies, he think that by his vnjust dea-ing I shalbe either the more discouraged or made the lefte diligent because I trust that the Lord of his vnmeasurale goodnes will grant me that I may with euene sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I give to the godly Readers a new proffe in this setting forth of this booke. Now in this trauell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy diuinittie to the reading of the word of God, that they may both haue an easie entric into it, and goe forward in it without flumbling: for I thinke that I haue in all points so knit vp together the summe of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well haue it in minde, it shall not be hard for him to determine both what he ought chiefly to seeke in Scripture: and to what marke to apply what soever is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plain, if I shal hereafter set forth any expositions of Scripture, because I shal not need to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, & to wander out into common places: I will alwaye knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shall be eased of great paine and tediousnes, so that he come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this pres-tent worke as with a necessarie instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth cleerely as in mirrors appeare in so many commentatories of mine, I had rather to declare indeed what it is, than to set it out in worde. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receive any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

WHAT CHAPTERS ARE contained in the Bookes of this Institution.

In the first booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator: are contained xvij. Chapters.

That the knowledge of God, & of ourselves, are things conjoined: and how they be linked the one with the other.

2 What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

4 That the same knowledge is either choaked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

5 That the knowledge of God doth shinningly appear in the making of the world, and in the continuall government thereof.

6 That to attaine to God the creator, it is needfull to have the scripture to be our guide and maiftries.

7 By what testimonie the scripture ought to be established, that is by the witnesses of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remaine certain: And that it is a wicked intention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the judgement of the Church.

8 That so far as mans reason may bear, there are sufficient proofs to establish the credit of the Scripture.

9 That those fantastical men, which forsaking Scripture, refort unto revelation, do overthrow all the principles of godinesse.

10 That the Scripture, to correct all su-perftition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the Gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

11 That it is unlawful to attribute unto God a visible forme, & that generally, they forsake God, so many as do erect to themselues any images.

12 That God is severally discerned from idols, that hee may bee onely and wholly worshipp'd.

13 That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence containeth in it three perfections.

14 That the Scripture even in the creation of the world, and of all things, doth by certain marks put difference between the true God, and fained Gods.

15 What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, and of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.

16 That God by his power doth nourish and maintain the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his prouidence doth governe all the parts thereof.

17 Whereeto and to what end this doctrine is to be applied, that wee may bee certaine of the profit thereof.

18 That God doth soe the service of wicked men, and so boweth their minds to put his judgement in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

In the second booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Chrif, which knowledge was first opened to the fathers in the time of the law, and then to us in the Gospel, are contained xvij. Chapters.

That by Adams sin and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate:

FINIS.
THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

That the knowledge of God, and of our selves, are things coniogned:
and how they be linked the one with the other.

HE whole summe in a manner of all our wisdom, which only ought to be accounted true and perfect wisdom, consisteth in two partes, that is to say, the knowledge of God, and of our selves. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bondes linked together: yet whether goth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discerne. For, first no man can looke vpon himselfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whom he liueth and is knowen: because it is plain, that those gifts wherewith we he indued, are not of our selves, yea, even that that we have being nothing els but an effence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by dropsmele powerd into vs from heaven, we are led as it were by certaine streams to the spring head. And so by our owne neediness, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abid-theth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereinto the fall of the first man hath throwne vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eies, not onely being fooddeffe and hungrie, to craye from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to leare humiliation. For as there is found in man a certaine worde of all miseries, and since we have beene spoyled of the divine apparel, our shamefull nakedness discloseth an infinite heape of filthie disgracements: it must needs be that every man be pricked with knowledge in conference of his owne vnhappiness to make him come at the least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the understanding of our ignorance, vanity, beggerie, weakenesse, peruerse, and corruption, we learn to reknowledge that no where else but in the Lord abideth the true light of wisdom, found vertue, perfect abundance of all good things, and puretie of righteousnes. And so by our owne enuis we are shirred to consider the good things of God: and we cannot earnestly aspire toward him, vntill we begin to dislike our selves. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in himselfe? yea, who doth not rest, so long as he knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne giftes, and ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne miserie? Therefore every man is by the knowledge of himselfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

2 Again, it is certaine, that man never commeth vnto the true knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse he have first beholde the face of God, and from beholding thereof doe descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alwayes thinke our selves righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntill that with manifest prooues we be convinced of our vnrighteousnesse, filthinesse, flihillnesse, and vncleannes.
Cap. 1. Of the knowledge of cleanness. But we are not convinced thereof, if we look upon ourselues onely, and not upon God also, who is the only rule whereby this judgement ought to be tried.

For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousnes doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousnes in deed.
And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, that is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat leste filthie pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we hold our selues within the boundes of mans vn-cleaneses. Like as the eie that is vised to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly difcerne by our bodely sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at midday we either looke downe vp on the ground, or beholde those things that round about lie open before our eies, then we think our selues to have very assurred and pearcing force of sight: but when we looke vp to the skye, and be-holde it with fixed eies, then that same sharpeneffe that was of great force upon the ground, is with so great brightnes by and by daeled and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse that the same sharpesight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the skynes, is but mere dulle. Even so commeth it to paue in waiging our spirituall good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, so long being well contented with our owne righteousnes, wisdome & strength, we doe sweeteely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner holie gods. But if we once begin to raise vp our thought vnto God, and to waie what a one he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousnes, wisdom and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousnes, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednes: then that which did marvellously deceuie vs ynder colour of wisdome, shall stinke before vs as extreme follie: then that which did beare the face of strength, shall be pro-bred to be most miserable weaknesses. So slenderly doth that which in vs seemeth even most perfect, answer in proportion to the purenes of God.

3 Hereof proceedeth that trembling and amazednes, wherewith the scripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were stricken and astonisht so oft as they perceived the presence of God. For when we see that they which in his absence did stand allurede and vnmove, so soone as he discloseth his glorie, begin to quake and are so disquieted that they fall downe, yea are swallowed vp, and in manner are destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered thereby, that man is never sufficiently touched and inwardly moved with knowledge of his owne basenes, vntill he have compared himselfe to the majestie of God. But of such dismayne we have often examples both in the Judges and in the Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall die because the Lord hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the historie of Job, to throw men downe with knowledge of their owne follie, weakness, and vn-cleannes, bringeth alway his principal proofe from describing Gods wisdome, strength and cleanenes. And that not without caufe. For we see how Abraham, the neerer that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowl-
The second Chapter.

What it is to know God, and to what end sendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby we conceive that there is some God, but also that, whereby we learne so much as behooveth vs to know of him, and as is profitable for his glorie: finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we cannot saie that God is known where there is no religion nor godlines. But heere I do not yet touch that speciall kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselues reproue and accursed do conceive God the redeemer in Christ the meditator: but I speake onely of that first and simple manner of knowledge, whereby the order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, Sith manke is in this state, can perceiue God to be either a father, or author of salvation, or in anie wile favourable, vnlesse Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towards vs: yet it is one thing to perceiue that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence governeth vs, by his goodnes nouriseth vs, and endue vs with all kinds of blessings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lorde first simplicely appeareth as well by the making of the worlde, as by the generall doctrine of the Scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the Redeemer: hereupon arifie two sorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our minde cannot conceive the knowledge of God, but that it must gue to him some kinde of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simple to know that it is he onely that ought to be honoured and worshiped of all men, vnlesse we be also persuaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the ende that we should secke for nothing elsewhere but in him. Meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, so by his infinite power he sustaineth it, by his wisedome he governeth it, by his goodness he preferreth it, and specially mankinde herulcith by his righteousnes and judgement, suffreth by his mercy, and faugardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisedome, or of light, or of righteousnes, or of power, or of graces, or of sincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verily, that we shulde learne to looke for and craue all these things at his hande, and with thanksgiving account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a meere scholemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion: Godlines I call a reuerence of God, joyned with love of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefits. For men will never with willing obedience submit themselves to God, vntill they perceive that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea, they will never yeeld themselues truely and with all their hart wholly to him, vnlesse they assuredly beleue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

2 Therefore doe but trifle with vaine speculations, which in entreating of this question, do make it their purpose to discourse what thing God is, where it rather behoveveth vs to know what manner one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what ende serueth it to confesse as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth only delight himselfe with idlenesse, havin no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we may have nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serue to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reuerence: then that by guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hande, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy minde, but that thou must therewith all by and by thynke, that forasmuch...

as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subject and bound to his authority, that thou owsest him thy life, whatsoeuer thou enterprisest, whatsoeuer thou dost, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truly it followeth that thy life is perniciously corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our lawe to live by. Again, thou canst not cleerely see him, but that thou must needs knowe that he is the fountain and original of all good things, whereupon should grow both a desire to cleave unto him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptures did not draw his mind from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly minde doth nor as by a dreame imagine to herselfe anie God at adventure, but steadfastly beholdeth the onely and true God: and doth not false-lie forge of him whatsoeuer herselfe liketh, but is content to beleeue him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, and doth alway with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashness she passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the waie. And when the so knoweth him, because the understandeth that he governeth all things, the assuredly trusteth that he is her safe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth herselfe to his faith, because the understandeth that he is the author of all good things: therefor if any thing trouble her, or if she want any thing, by and by the lieth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is persuaded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence the reflecteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euils to finde a ready remedie in his mercifull kindness: Because she knoweth him to be her Lord and father, therefore she determineth that he is woorthie that she should in all things have regard to his authority, reverence his majestie, procure the advancement of his glorie, and obey his commandements. Because the feeth that he is a righteous Iudge, and armed with his feueritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his judgement before her eyes, and with feare of him with draweth and restraineth herselfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is the not so afraid with the feeling of his judgement, that she woulde converse herselfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather the doth no leste loue him, while he extendeth vengeance upon the wicked, then while he is beneficall to the godly, forasmuch as the understandeth that it doth no leste belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euil doers, than that he hath rewarde of eternall life for the righteous. Moreover she doth not for onely fear of punishment restraineth herselfe from sinning: but because she loueth and reverenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoreth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet the dreadeth his onely displeasure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, even faith joyned with an earnest feare of God, so that feare may containe in it a willing reverence, and draw with it a right forme of worthipping such as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, because all men generally do worship God, but fewe do reverence him, while each where is great pompous shewe in ceremonies, but the purities of hart is rare to be found.

3 Truely they that judge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is grauen in the mindes of men a certaine feeling of the Godhead, which never can be blotted out. Yea that this perswasion, that there is a God, is even from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the verie obtinacie of the wicked is a substantial wittnes, which with their furious strining yet can never winde themselues out of the feare of God. Although Diasovas and such other dod lefte and laugh at all that hath in all ages beene beleued concerning religion: although Dionysius doth scoffe at the heavenly judgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forwarde, because inwardly the worime of conscience groweth them much more sharply than all hot fearing irons. I alledge not this that Cicero faith, that errors by continuance of time grow out of vs, and religion dayly more more and more encreaseth and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we shall have occasion to shew) trauelleth as much as it lyeth to shake off all knowledge of God, and by all means to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dull hardnesse, which the wicked doe deisrously labour to get to despise God withall, doth lyeepingely in their hearts, yet the fame feeling of God, which they would most of all desire to have utterly destroyed, liueth full, and sometime doth vert et se felfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is suit to be learned in schooles, but such a one whereof euerie man is a teacher to his felfe euene from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bende all their endeavour to shake it out of their minde. Nor, if all men bee borne and do line to this ende, to know God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanishe away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is evident, that they all fwarue out of kind from the law of their creation, that do not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselves were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likeneffe of God, when the soule haue throughly conceived the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore vere aptely doth Grilus reafon in Plutarch, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion bee once taken from their life, are not onely nothing better than brute beasts, but also many waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to fo many forts of euils, they continually draw foorth a troublesome vnquiet life: and therefore the worship-ping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brute beastes, by which alone they aspire to immortallitie.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

We hold it out of controversy, that there is in the minde of man, even by natural instinct, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the ende that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himfelf hath planted in all men a certaine understanding of his divine maiftie, the remembrance whereof, with pouering in now and then as it were newe drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worchiped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the groefte forts of peoples and fardest from ciuill order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man faith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so favage, in whom refteth not this perfwation that there is a God. And even they that in other parts of their life feme verie little to differ from brute beastes, yet do continually kepe a certaine fede of religion. So thouroughly hath this common principle possefted all mens minds, and so fast it fuccketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bee no countrey, no citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplid a certaine fecret confeffion, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the harts of all men. Yea, and idolatry it selfe is a fubfiantiall frough of this perfwation. For we know how unwillingly man abafeth himfelfe to honoure other creatures above himfelfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, then he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprindt perfwation of God is of moft great force, which is impossible to be raued out of the minde of man, that it is much more eafe to have the affection of nature broken, as indeede it is broken when man from his owne naturall dwelling pride of his owne will floueth downe euen to the basest creatures to honour God.
Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of

2 Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was devised by the suttletie and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselves that procured other to worship God, beleued nothing lesse then that there was any God at all. I graunt indeed that some men have invented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reverence, and caft them in a fear, to make their minde the more pliable to obedience: But this they could never have brought to passe, vnlesse the minde of men had beene already before hand perswaded that there was a God, out of which perswaion as out of seede springeth that readie inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that euen they which suttlety deceived the simple sort with colour of religion, were themselves altogether without knoledge of God. For though in times past there have beene some, and at this day there arife vp many that deny that there is any God; yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We read of none that euer did breake foorth into more presumptuous and vnbridled despising of God, than Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And for against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endevoured to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the verie noyse of the falling of a leaf. And whence commeth that, but from the reneging of Gods maieftie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their conscience as they more labour to fly away from it? They do in deed looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide themselves from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tyed. For howsoeuer sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it oyt returneth againe, and with new alloute doth hurrie upon them: so that the rest which they have, if they have any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or franticke men, which euen while they sleepe do not quietly rest, because they are at euerie moment vexed with horrible and dreadful dreams. Therefore the verie vngodly themselves ftere for an example to prooue that there alway liueth in all mens minds some knowledge of God.

Theiii. Chapter.

That the same knowledge is either choked, or corruppted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

By as experience teacheth that God hath sown the seede of religion in all men, so scarcely may be founde the hundreth man, that haung it conceived in his hart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so far is it of that any fruit appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some do of set purpos purpose maliciouly revolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So commeth it to passe that there remaineth no true godliness in the world. But whereas I said that some by error fall into superstition, I meane not thereby as though their simplicitie might excuse them from blame, because the blindness that they haue, is commonly alyway mingled both with proude vanitie, and with flubbornetie. Vanitie and the fame joyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not clime above themselves as they ought to have done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshly dullness, and also neglecting the founde manner of searching for him, do curiously flie to vaine speculations. And to they conceiue him not such a one as he offereth himselfe; but do imagine him such a one as of their owne rash presumption they have forsook him. Which gulle being once opened, what way so ever they flite their fette, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction.
For whatsoever afterward they goe about towards the worshipping or service of God, they cannot account it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the deceit of their owne heart, and their owne dream in stead of him. This pernicious doth Paul expresslie teach, where he faith, that they were made fools when they counted to be wise. He had before said, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobriety, but presumptuously taking upon them themselves more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkness vpon them, yea, vnhonest vaine and froward pride do make themsevles fools. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnesse is not excusable, whereof the cause is not onely vaine curiositie, but also greediness to know more than is meete for them, joyned with a false confidence.

2 As for this that David faith, that the wicked and mad men think in their hearts, that there is no God: First that is meant onely of those that choking the light of nature, do of purpose make themselves senseless, as we shall see againe a little hereafter. Even as we see that manie after that they have beene hardened with boldnes and outwight of sinning, do furiously put from them all the remembrance of God, which yet is by vvere feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their minds. Now David, to make their madnesse the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God; although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his judgement and prudence, they shew him vpp idle in heaven. For whereas nothing leftt agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the government of the world, and leave it to fortune, to winke at the finnes of men, so as they may live in licentious outrage vnpunished: whatsoever he be that quenching the fear of the heavenly judgement, doth carelesly follow his owne affections, he denmeth that there is a God. And this is the just vengeance of God, to draw a finnes out their hearts, so that the wicked when they have once closed their eyes, even in seeing may not see. And David in another place is the best expounder of his owne meaning, where he faith: That the fear of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Againe, that in their euel doings they proudly rejoice at themselues, because they persuade themselues that God doth not looke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they do rob him of his glory in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot deny himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so it is truly faide, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, do denie God. Moreover it is to be noted that although they wrasse against their owne natural feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from hence, but also to destroy him in heaven: yet their dull hardnesse can never so far prevaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his judgement seat. But as for much as they are not withheld with any fear from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there reigneth in them a brutish forgetfulness of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcibly carrie them.

3 So is that vaine defence overthrowen, which many are wont to pretende for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any devotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it bee, though it be never so much contrary to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetual rule: and that God himselfe abideth alwaye like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or fantase, that may be diuerely fashioned after euyey mans liking. And truly we may plainly see with how lying deceites superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching holde of those things in a manner onely, which God hath testified that he careth not for, the either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appoineth and faith to be pleasant.
Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoever do sett yp newe invented forme of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne deifying deities; because they durst not so trifle with God, vnsce they had first sained a God, agreeing with the follies of their ending royes. Wherefore the Apollo pronounces, that that viatated and wandering opinion of the maiestie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (faith he) yee knewe not God, yee serued them that in nature were no gods. And in another place he faith that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they strayed from the right knowledge of the one God. And at leaft in this case, it difference not much, whether thou beleeue one God or many; because in both cases thou departest from and forsaikest the true God: whom when thou haft once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Laetun, there that is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is toyned with truth.

4. There is also a second fault, that they neither have at any time any consideration of God, but against their wills, doe approach toward him, till for all their holding backe they be forrobled drawn to him; and even then also they have not a willing feare that proceedeth from reverence of Gods maiestie, but onely a servile and constrained feare, which the judgement of God wringeth out of them; which judgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dreads it. But yet as they are onely taken out of where they abhorre it. And so that laying of Statius, that feare first made gods in the world, may be fully spoken of vngodliness, and of this kinde of vngodliness onely. They that have amunde abhorring from the justice of God, do hartily will to have his throne of judgement overthrown, which they know to stande for punishment of offences against his justice by which affection they warre against God, who cannot be without his judgement. But when they understand that his power impossible to be avoided, and yet to be escaped, therefore they feare it. So leafl they shoulde in all things seeme to despiete him, whose maiestie still preseth upon them, they use certain outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the mean time they cease not to defile themselves with all kinde of vices, to ioyn outrageous muchies to muchies, vntill they haue in all points violate the holy law of the Lord, and destroyed his whole righteousness, or at leaft they are not so holde backe with that sained feare of God, but that they sweetely rest in their times, and flatter themselves, and had rather to follow the intemperance of their flesh than restringe it with the bridale of the holy Ghost. But forasmuch as the same is but a voide and lying shado of religion, yea fearcely worthy to be called a shadow; therby againe is easily gathered, how much the true godliness, which is powerd onely into the harts of the faithfull, I mean that out of which religion springeth, doth differ from this confuse knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked complices, to seeme nigh vnto God, whom they lie from. For whereas there ought to have beene one continual vnbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their doings carlessly rebelling against him, labour with a few sacrifices to appease him. Whereas they ought to have satisfied him with holinesse of life and sincerenesse of hart, they inuent trifling & obseruations of no value, to procure his favour withall. yea they do the more licentionally lie dull in their owne dregees, because they trueth that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propiciatory satisfactions. Finally whereas their alliance ought to have beene fastened in him, they neglecting him do rest in themselves, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselves with such a heap of errors, that the daie shiuf of malice doth choke, and at last utterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glorie of God. Yet that seede still remaineth which can by nonean be plucked vp by the rootes, to beleeue that there is a certaine godhead: but the same seede is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but verie cuill fruittes. Yea thereby is that which I trauaile to prooue more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in the harts of men, forsasmuch as the verie reprobate themclues are of necessity enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperitie they pleaantly moocke at God, yea they are full of talke and prating to diminish the greatness of his power: but if once any despera\n\ntion touch them, it streweth them vp to feke the fame God, and minis\nthreth them for\ndane short prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not vitally ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to have bee\nne vittered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

That the knowledge of God doth fluently appeare in the making of the\nworld and in the continuall government thereof.

Mo\n\ncour because the furthest end of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of\nGod: that the way to felicite should be stopped to none, therefore God hath\nnot onely planted in the mindes of men that seede of religion which we have spoken\nof, but also hath so dislo\nced himselfe in the whole worke\nman\nh of the wor\n\nde, and daily so mani\nestly presen\ntheth himselfe, that men cannot open their eyes but they must needes behold him. His substance indee\nede is incomprehensible, so that his diuine\n\nmajesty farre surmounteth all mens sen\nes: but he hath in all his workes grauen cer\ntaine marke\s of his glorie, and those so plaine and notably discernible, that the ex\ncus\e of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer so grosse and dull witted. Therefore the pro\n\nphete right\n\nyfel\n\nte crieth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should have faide, that then he first began to come foorth to be\n\nsecne in visible apparel, since the time that he first displayed his ensignes in the crea\ntion of the wor\n\nde, by which eu\n\n\nnow what way focuer we turne our cies, he appe\n\n\nreth glorious vnto vs. In the same place al\n\nso the same Prophet aptly compareth the\nheausen as they be displayed abroad, so his royall pavilion: the faith that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the cloudes are his chariots, that he rideth upon the wings of the windes, that the windes and lightenings are his swift messengers. And because the glorie of his power and wisedome doth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his pallace. And first of all, what wait focuer thou turne thy cies, there is no pence of the worlde be it neuer so small, wherein are not scene at least some sparkles of his glorie to shine. But as for this most large and beautifull frame, thou canst not with one viewe peruse the wide compass of it, but that thou must needes be on euery side ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews doth ver\n\newell call the ages of the world the spectacle of im\nvisible things, for that the fo od\nerly framing of the world sreueth vs for a mirror wherein we may beholde God, which otherwise is im\nvise. For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heauenly\ncreatures a language that all nations vnderstand, for that in them there is a more cer\ntent testification of the godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly faith, that there is dis\nlo\nced vnto men so much as was be\nhooleful to be known concerning God: because all men without exception, do throughly see his invisible things eu\n\n\n\nto his verie power and Godhead, which they vnderstand by the creation of the world.

2 As for his woonderful wisedome, there are innumerable prooues both in hea\n\nuen and in earth that witnisses it: I meanie not onely that secretor sort of things, for the neerer marking whereof ASTro\nlogie, Physicke, and all naturall Philosophie sreueth, but eu\n\n\n\nven those things that thrust themselves in sight of every one, eu\n\n\n\nen of the rudest \n\nvulearned man, so that men cannot open their cies but they must needes be witnisses thereof.

of them. But truly they that have digested, yea or but tasted the liberal Arts, being holpen by the aide thereof, doe proceed much farther to looke into the secrets of God's works: And yet there is no man so hindered by lacke of knowledge of those Arts, but that he throughly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in God's works, to bring him in admiration of the workman thereof. As for example to the searching out of the mounings of the fathers, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth Art and an exact diligence: by which being throughly perceiued, as the providence of God is the more manifestly disclos'd, so it is convenient that the minde rise for what the higher thereby to behold his glory. But from such as the unlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the only helpe of their eyes, cannot be ignorant of the excellency of God's cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so feuerely well ordered and disposed variety doth of itself flow forth it self: as evident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisedome. Likewise it requireth a singular sharines of wit, to woye with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportional agreement, the beautie, and fve in the frame of mans bodie: but by all mens confession, the body of man doth vertue in verie thewe of it selfe so cunning a compacting togethers, that for it the maker of it may worthily be judged wonderfull.

And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in old time did not without counte call man a little world, because he is a bare representation of the power, goodness and wisedome of God, and containeth in himselfe myrales enough to occupie our minde, if we were content to make them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had said that the verie blinde men may finde out God by groping for him, by and by faith further, that he is not to be sought farre of, because all men do see vndoubtedly within themselves the heavenly grace wherewith they bee quickened. But if wee need to go no further then ourselves to finde and take hold of God: what pardon shall his brutish selfe deserve that will not vouchsafe to descende into himselfe to finde God? And the same is the reason why David when he had shortly spoken in the advancement of the wondertfull name and honour of God that do every where gloriously shine, by and by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindful of him? Again out of the mouth of infants, and sucking babes, thou hast established strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kinde of man is a mirroure of the worke of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breasts, haue toongs eloquent enough to preache his glory, so that there needeth no other Orators. And therefore he doubteth not to set their mouths in the vawarde, as being strongly armed to subdue their maligne: that woulde according to their diuellish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And heerupon riseth that which Paul alledgeth out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God: because he garnishing vs with such excellency, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euery common reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truely no man will affentiingly and willingly yield himselfe to fear God, but he that having tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

And here is disclosed the soule vunthankfulnes of men, which while they have within themselves a workhouse gloriously furnished with innumerable worke of God, and alio a stop stuffed with inestimable plenty of riches, and when they ought to burst foorth into praising of him, are contrariwise stuffed vp and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They seeke how diversly in marvellous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of giftes they possess by his liberallitie: whether they will or no, they are inforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppress it close within them. Truely they

need not to goe out of themselues, so that they would not in presumptuously taking upon themselves that which is guuen from heauen, but within the ground that which brightly ginneth light to their minde to see God. But even at this day the earth beareth many monstreous spirits, which sticke not to abuse the whole seede of godhead that is lowen in mans nature, and to employ it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madness, that man finding God a hundred times in his body & his soule, should by the very fame pretence of excellency denote that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from brute beasts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so doe conuey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eies euyn to the nailes of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, doe represent a divine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlue the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes woulde (bearing themselues bold vpon this hie degree) outrageouslie make war against God. Do the whole treaures of the heavenly wisedome doe interwet to rule a worne of suete fere long: and shall the whole vnuuerfalitie of the world be without this prerogative? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the partes of man, doth fo fuse nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answere me, what meeting of vndivisible bodies, bowling the meate and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrements and part into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endwearing to doe their office, even as if so many fuearall soules did by commonadult wise rule one bodie.

But I have not now to doe with that fylte of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being guuen to fulfillers, would by crooked conuenience with that cold laying of Aristoteles, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bunde the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, and with praifes of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are far from being inclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the stars, to learn the greatness of one, to know what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or flownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or that way? I grant in deed that there is some vfe of Astrologie: but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so depe searching out of heavenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe: fuearall from the bodie. I have shewed one example, by which it shall be calle for the readers to gather the rest. Truely the manifold nimblenesse of the soule, by which it seeweth both heauen and earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, and expreseth each thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniositie by which it inuenteth things incrediblie, and which is the mother of so many maruellous artes, are sure tokens of divine nature in man. Beside that, even in sleepe there is not onely roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiue many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophesieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may heare that man shall be of divine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we sooth by judgement that is put into vs difference betweene right and wrong, and shal there be no judge in heauen? Shall we even in our sleepe have abiding with vs some remnant of understanding, and shal no God be waking in governinge the world? Shall we be so counted the inuerterers of so many artes and profitable things, that God shall...
Cap. 5.  Of the knowledge of

shall be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from another and not from our selves, all that we have, is in divers wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelinesse to the world, it is not onely weake, but also vngodly. They like wel that famous sayling of Vergil:

First heaven and earth, and flowing fieldes of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars, Spirit feedes within, and throughall all the lims, Infused minde the whole huge masse doth move,
And with the large big bodie mixt it selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beastes, And lines of flying foules, and monsters strange, That water beares within the marble Sea.
A sterie liuelinesse and heauenly race there is Within those feedes, &c.

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the Creator of itselfe. So in another place the same author following the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, faith:

Same say that bees have part of minde divine,
And heavenly draughtes, for eke they say that God Gothe through the coasts of land, and creekes of sea, And through deepes skie. And hence the flockes and herdes, And men, and all the kindes of savage beastes Each at their birth receive their fustile lines.
And therefor are they renderd all at last,
And all resolved are returnde againe.
No place there is for death: but lively they,
Flie into number of the stars above,
And take their place within the lofties skie.

Loc. what that hungrie speculation of the vnuerse fall minde that giueth soule and liuelinesse to the world, availeth to engender and nourish godlinesse in the hearts of men. Which doth also better appeare by the blashemous saylings of the filthie dog Lucretius, which are derived from the same principle. Even this is it, to make a shadow with God, to drive farre away the true God whom we ought to feare and worship. I graunt indeed that this may be godlyflied, so that it proceed from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard and an vnproper manner of speech, for as much as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religiuoussesse, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confusedly with the inferiour courte of his worke. Let vs therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which do governeth all naturis, that his will is to haue vs looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called vpon of vs: because there is nothing more against convenientie of reasone, than for vs to enjoy those excellent gifts that favour of divine nature in vs, and to despise the author that freely doth giue them vnto vs. Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceably draw vs to consider it, vnlesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his owne word to vphold this infinite maffe of heauen and earth, with his owne becke, sometime to shake the heaven with noise of thunders, to burne vp each thing with lightenings, to set the aire on fire with lightning flames, sometime to trouble it with dutes fowtes of tempests, and by and by the same God when he lift in one moment to make faire weather: to holde in the Sea as it flung in the aire, which with his heighth seemeth to threaten continuall destruction to the earth, sometime in horrible horrible wife to raise it up with outrageous violence of winds, and sometime to appease the waues and make it calme againe. For prove the heat of doe ferue all the praises of God gathered of the testimonies of nature, especially in the booke of Job and in Esay, which now of purpose I ouersee, because they shal els where have another place fitter for them, where I shall encrease of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Oney my meaning was now to touch, that both strangees and they of the household of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, thar is, to follow these first draughts which both abose and beneath do as in a windowe set forth a lively image of him. And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie. For it must needs be that he from whom all things haue their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himselfe. But now if any man enquire the cause whereby he both was once lead to create all these things, and is now moved to preferre them: we shall finde that his onely goodnes was it that caused him. Yea and although this onely be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the loue of him, for asmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet saith) vnpon which his mercie is not powred out.

6. Allso in the feconord of his works, I meane thoche that come to passe beside the ordinary course of nature, there doth appeare no litle evident prove of his powers. For in governing the fellowship of men he do ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his favourable kindness to the godly, and his feuenitie to the wicked and euill doers. For not doubtfull are the punishments that he layeth vpon haynous offences: like as he doth openly shew himselfe a defender and reveuger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessity, asshaveth and comforteth their forowes, relieueth their calamities, and by all meanes prouideth for their fatte. Neither ought it any thing to defiance the perpetuall rule of his justice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euill doers for a time to reioice vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be rooffed with many aduersities, yea and to be oppressed with the malice and uniffe dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrarie consideration ought to enter into our minde that when by manifest shew of his wrath he punisheth one sinne, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished, we should thereupon thinke that there shall be another judgement to which they are differenced to be then punishid. Likewise how great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercie, while he oftentimes causeth not to shew his vnwearied bountifulnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, vntill he haue subdued their frowardnes with doing them good.

7. To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in cases past hope, doth suddenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succoure men that are in miserie and in a manner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wildernes from the wilde beasts, and al length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth foode to the needie and hungry, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dungeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in perill of shipwrecke safe into the haven, or healeth the halfe dead of diseases, or forseth the earth with heat and drouth, or maketh it fruitfull with secret watering of his grace, or aduanse the bals of the rafcall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the high degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed forth, he gathereth that those things which are judged chances happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specially of his fatherly kindnesse, and that thereby is gaine matter of rejoicing to the godly, and the wicked and reprobrate haue their mouths stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errors are blinde in so, elevere a place of beholding,
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of ding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdom, wisely to wey these works of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit that otherwise seem most clear are sighted. And truly how much greater the glory of God doth apparent-lie shine before them, yet scarstly the hundredth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power and wisdom are no more hid in darknes: whereof the one, his power, doeth notably appeare, when the fierce outrageousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion unconquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogante tamed, their strongest holdes rafed, their weapons and armour broken in pieces; their strengthes subdued, their deuils overthrown, and themselves fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldnes, that avaued it selfe above the heavens is thrown downe euery euent to the bottome point of the earth againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the durt, and the needle raised from the dunghill, the oppressed and affliction are drawn out of extreme distreffe, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, the vnamed beare away the victome from the armed, fewe from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisdom, it selfe sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it disposeth every thing in finest opportunitie, confoundeth the wisdom of the world be it never so pearing, findeth out the subtiltie in their subtiltie, finally governeth all things by most convenient order.

8 We see that it needeth no longer labourome demonstration, to fetch out testimonies, to curse for the glorious declaration and proofe of God's majestie: for by these fewe that we have touched, it appeareth, that which way focure a man chance to looke, they are so common and readie that they may bee easily marked with eie, and pointed out with the finger. And heere againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contained in vaine speculation, doth but sitte about in the braine, but such as shall be found and fruitfull, if it be rightly conceited and take roote in our harts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we seelie within vs, and do enjoy the benefits of them, it must needs be that we be inwardly moued much more hopefully with such a knowledge, than if we should imagine God to be such anone, of whom we should have no feeling. Whereby we understand that this is the rightest way and firstest order to, seeke God, not to attempt to enter deeply with presumptuous curiousitie throughly to discisse his substance, which is rather to be reverently worshiped than scrupu-iously searched: but rather to behold him in his worke, by which he maketh himselue neere and familiar, and doth in a manner communicate himselue vnto vs. And this the Apostle ment, when he saide, that God is not to be sought a farre of, forthat much as he with his most present power dwelleth within euery one of vs. Wherefore David having before confessed his unspeakable greatness, when he descended the to the particular rehearfall of his worke, protesteth that the fame will flow forth it selfe. Therefore we also ought to give our skies into such a searching out of God, as may so holde our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall through-ly mooue vs with effectuall feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceive him, it behooueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatness, to looke vnto his worke, that we may be refreshed with his goodnesse.

9 Then such a knowledge ought not only to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, and raffe vs to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifullnesse, and of his fuerite, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke, that heere-in he doth but make a fawle above the handes of those things, whereof the open disclo-and full deliverr is differeth vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by the vngoody greated with afflictions, troubled with injuries, oppressed with flanders, and vexed with defperate dealings and reproches: contra-niwife that wicked doers doe flourishing, prosper and obtain quiet with honour, yea, and that unpunished: we must by and by gather that there shall be another life, wherein is laid vp in store both due revenge for wickednes, and reward for righteousnes. Moreover when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rods of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much leffe the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For verie well is that spoken of Augustine. If every sinner should now be punished with open pame, it would be thought that nothing were referred to the last judgement. Again, if God should now openly punishe no sinner, it would be beleued, that there were no providence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euerie particular worke of God, but principally in the vniversal generallitie of them, the powers of God are set foorth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicite. But whereas these his powers doe in his worke moost brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what vnloure they bee, and to what end we ought to vew them: this we then only attaine to understond when we descend into our felues, and do consider by what meanes God doth shew foorth in vs his life, wisedome, and power, and doth vs towards vs his righteousness, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnesse. For though David justly complaineth, that the vnbeseeking doe dose in folly, because they wey not the depe counselaes of God in his governance of mankinde: yet, that is also most true, which he faith in another place, that the woonderfull wisedome of God in that behalfe exceedeth the haires of our head. But because this point shall hereafter in place convenient be more largely entered, therefore I do at this time passe it ource.

10 But with how gratt brightness doe ever God doth in the mirroure of his works shineth by representation both himselfe and his immortal kingdom: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stand dully amazed at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without profite. For, as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the world, how many a one is there of vs, that when he either lifteth vp his eyes to heauen, or casteth them about on the divers countreys of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest in beholding the works without having regard of the workman? But as touching those things that duly happen beside the order of natural course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about and rowled by blinde vnadvisednesse of fortune, then governed by providencen of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding and direction of those things drawn to the consideration of God, (as all men must needs be) yet so soone as we haue without aduisement conceived a feeling of some godhead, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inuentiones of our flesh, and with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein in dece we differ one from another, that every man privately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, vnto one exception, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wits are subiect, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are indued with singular sharpnesse of understanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole feet of Philosophers betrayed their owne dullenesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe over all the rest, which are much more vneasenably foolish, Plate himselfe, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainely errd in his rounde globe. Now what might not chaunce to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to give light to the rest, do themselues fo erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods governance of mens matters doth so plainly procure his providence, that it can not be denied, yet this doth no more premaiie with men, then if they beleued that all things are tossed vp and downe with the rauh will of Fortune: so great is our incli-

I. Hereof proccedeth that uneayneurufle sink of errors, where with the whole world hath been filled and ouerflowen, For each mans will is to himselfe a maze, so that it is no manfull that every severall nation was duefly drawn into severall deuises, & not that only, but also that each severall man had his severall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonneffe was joyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath beene fcarcely at any time any one man founde, that did not forget to himselfe an idol or fanfie in fleede of God. Truely, even as out of a wide and large spring do issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while every man ouer licentiously straying, erroneously deuised this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not heere to make a regifter of the superstitions, where with the world hath beene entangled: because both in so doong I should sooner have end, and also though I speake not one word of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeereth howe horrible is the blindnesse of mans minde. I passe over the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pearce into heauen, how shameful is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with fo much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing falsie colours. The Stoices seemd in their own conceit to speake very wisely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered diuerse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby the more unditer. As though we were not alreadie more than enough inclined to vanitie, vnlesse a manifie plentie of gods yet before vs, should further and more violently draw vs into error. Alfo the AEgyptians mystical science of diuinitie sheweth, that they all diligently endeauore to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first fight some thing seeming probable, might deceuie the simple & ignorants: but no mortall man euery inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not beeone fouly corrupted.
And this so confuse diueriticie emboldened the Epicures and other grosse despisers of godlines, by little and little to caft off all feeling of God. For when they saw the wis-ofal to strue in contrary opinions, they sticked not out of their difagrements, & out of the foolish or apparently erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather that men do in yaine and fondly procure tormentes to themselves while they search for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without punishment, because it was better briefly to denye utterly, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine gods, and so to raise vp contentions that never shoulde haue ene.
And too much fondly do they reason, or rather caft a mifte, to hide their vngodlines by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing shoulde be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all do confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned do so much disaffere, thereupon is gathered that the wis-of men are more than dull & blind in heavenly mysteries, that do so erre in seeking out of God. Some other do praiue that answer of Synomides, which being demaun-ded of king Hieron, what God was, desirde to haue a daies respite granted him to study upon it. And when the next day following, the king demaundd the same question he required two daies respites, and so oftentimes doubling the number of daies at length he answered: How much the more I consider it, do much the harder the mater seemeth unto me. But granting that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to confused principles to worship an unknown God.

Now we must also hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they must needs do that are given to their owne opinion) do depart from the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they mean, or what they persuade themselves maketh not much to the matter, Sith the holy Ghost pronounceth, that all they are Apostates, that according to the darknes of their owne minds doth thwart dutes in the place of God. For this reason, Paul pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they had learned by the Gospel, what it was to worship the true God. And we must not think this to be spoken of one nation only, for as he generally affirmed in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, since in the creation of the world, the Majesty of the Creator was disclosed unto them. And therefore the Scripture, to make place for the true and one only God, condemneth of falsehood and lying, whatsoeuer godhead in old time was celebrated among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished the peculiar knowledge of God. Truly, among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Christe's time seemed to approach nighest to true godlines: and yet we hear it spoken by Christ's owne mouth, that they knewe not what they worshipp. Whereupon followeth, that they were deceived with vaine error. Finalie, although they were not all infected with grosse faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approved religion that was grounded only upon common reason. For albeit, that there were a fewe that were so mad as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this worlde conceiue not the wisdom of God. Now if the most excellent have wandered in darkness, what is to be said of the very dregs? Wherefore it is no marvel, if the holy Ghost do refuse as bastard worshippings all formes of worshipp, deuiding by the will of men. Because in heavenly mysteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it do not alway breed a heape of errors, yet is alway the mother of error. And though there come no worfe of it, yet is this no small fault, at aduenture, so worship an unknowne God: of which fault, all they by Christ's owne mouth are pronounced guilty, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that ever were, proceeded no further, than to say that religion was grounded vpon common content. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answer of Apollos, wherein he willed that every man should worship gods after the manner of the country, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authority to determine that which faire suffrometh the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receive without doubting a God delivered by mans deuise? Every man rather will stand to his owne judgement, than yeeld himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake and feeble a bonde of godlines, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a citie or the content of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himself must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

In vaine therefore so many lampes' lightned doe shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glory of the creator, which do every way displace their beams vpon vs, that yet of them selves they can not bring vs into the right waie. Indeed they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as be choked vp before that they can spread abroad any full brightnes. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the worlde images of things invisibl, faith further, that by faith is perceiued, that they were framed by the word of God, meaning thereby that the invisible godhead is indeed represented by such theues, but that we haue no eyes to see the fame thoroughly, vnlesse they be enlightened by the revelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be knouen concerning God, doth not meane such a disclosing as may be comprched by the wit of men, but rather sheweth that the fame proceedeth

Therefore, although that same brightness, which both in heaven & earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickedness of men, even so as God, to wrap all mankind in one guiltiness, doth shew his divine majesty to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it necessary that we have also another and a better helpe that may rightly direct us to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his worde that thereby he might be known to salvation. And this prerogative he hath vouchsafed to give vs, whom it pleased him more neerely and more familiarly to draw together to himselfe. For because he saw the minde of all men to be caried about with wandering and unsettled motion, after he had choosen the Israelites to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with bares, that they shoulde not wander out in vaine as other did. And not without cause: he holdeth vs with the same mean in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwife even they should quickly swarme away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of other. For as old men, or publique, or they whose eyes are dimmes sighted, if you lase a faire booke before them, though they perceate that there is somewhat written therein, yet can they not reade two wordes together: but being holpen with spectaclees set betwene
between them and it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering together in our minds the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remove the mist, and plainly shew vs the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church God vies not onely dumme teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipp'd, but also therewithall pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worshipp: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also prefeneth himselfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to give them also his word. Which is the righter and eterniter mark to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, and the rest of the fathers by this help attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were generallly different from the vnbelieuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternall life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needfull for them to know God not onely to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubts they obtained both by the word. For that kind of knowledge whereby was given to understand who is the God by whom the world was made and is governed, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge, adioyned, which onely quickneth dead soules, whereby God is known not onely to be the maker of the world & the only author & judge of all things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the covenant whereby God hath adopted to himselfe the children of Abraham, & of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithfull have alway bin peculiarly feared from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded on Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine marks severally discerned from the counterfeit multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shall conveniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall allege many testimonies out of the newe Testament, and some also out of the law and the Prophets, wherein is express mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this end, to proue that in the Scripture is disloofed vnto vs God the creator of the world, and in the scripture is set forth what we ought to thinke of him, to the end that we should not secke about the bush for an uncertaine godhead.

2 But whether God were known to the fathers by oracles and visions, or whether by the mean & ministration of men he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand decler to their posteritie: yet it is undoubtedly true, that in their harts was engraven a fixed certaine of doctrine, so as they might be perswaded & understood, that it which they had learne came from God. For God alwayes made vndoubted assurance for credit of his word, which far exceeded all vncertaine opinion. At length that by continuall proceeding of doctrine, the truth suruiuing in all ages might still remaine in the world, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to have as it were enrolld in publicke tables. For this intent was the law published, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expostors. For though there were duers vses of the law, as hereafter shall better appear in place convenient; and specially the principall purpose of Moses, and all the Prophets was to teach the manner of reconciliation between God and men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediator, the Scripture doth by certaine marks and tokens paint out the only & true God, in that that he hath created and doth governe the world, to the end he should be eterniter known and not reckoned in the false number of fained gods. Therefore although it behooueth man earnestly to bend his eies to consider the workes of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgious stage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit thereby. And therefore it is no manner that they which are borne in darknes do more and more waxe hard in their amazed dulnes, because very few of them do give themselves piable to learne of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather reioyce in their owne vanitie. Thus then ought we to holde, that to the ende true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine. And that no man can have any tast be it never so little of true and found doctrine, vnlesse he have beene scholer to the Scripture. And from hence groweth the original of true understanding, that we reverently embrace whatsoever it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not only the perfect and in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truely in this behalfe God of his singular prouidence hath prouided for men in and for all ages.

3 For if we consider how slipperye an inclination mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulness of God, how great a readiness to fall into all kindes of errors, howe great a luft to forge oftimes new and counterfeit religions, we may thereby perceive how necessarie it was to have the heavenly doctrine to put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vaine by errour, or be corrupted by boldneffe of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alway vsed the helpe of his worde, toward all those whom it pleased him at any time sufficiently to instruct, because he foresaw that his image imprinted in the most beautifull forme of the worlde was not sufficiently effectuall: Therefore it behooueth vs to trauell this straight way, if we earnestly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is well & lucyly set out by his workes, when his workes be well ordered after the peruerences of our own eftimacions, but according to the rule of the eternall truth. If we freauere from that word, as I saide euery now, although we run neuer fo faft: yet we shal not ever attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must thinke, that the bheartines of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be attained vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of where we cannot vnwrap our felues, vnlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to run neuer so faft in another. And therefore David oftimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the worlde, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himselfe a lawfull governement: because errours can never be rooted out of the harts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4 Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the works of his handes, that the orderlie succeeding course of daies and nights preacheth his majestie, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The law of the Lord (faith he) is vndelied concurring soules: the witnesses of the Lord is faithfull: guying wisdome to little ones: the righteousnesses of the Lord are uprigh, making harts cheerefull, the commandement of the Lord is bright, guying light to the eies. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the lawe, yet in generaltie he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen & earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the 29. Psalm, where the Prophet hauing preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes,showers, whilke windes, & floures,shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the Cedar trees: in the end at last be goeth further & faith, that his praifes are sung in the sanctuarie,because the vnde-leueers are deafe and heare not all the voices of God that refound in the aire. And in like maner in another Psalme, after that he had defcribed the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus conclude: thy testimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holines for euery. And out of this meaning alo proceded that which Christ faide to the woman of Samaria, that her nation & the reft did honor that which they knew not, & that only the Jewes did worship the true God. For wheras the wit of man by reason of the feeblenes thereof can by no mean attain vnto God, but being holpen & lifted vp by his holy word, it followed of neceffitie, that all men, except the Jewes, did wander in vanitie and errour, becaufe they sought God without his word.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be eſtablithed, that is by the witneffe of the holy Ghoſt, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked invention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the judgement of the Church.

But before I goe any further, it is needfull to say somewhat of the authoritie of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens minds to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set forth, there is no man of fo deperate boldnesse, vnlesse he be voide of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speakeith it. But because there are not daily oracles giuen from heauen, and the one‐ly Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased him to preferue his truth to perpetuall memorie, the fame Scripture by none other meanes is of full credite among the faithful, but in that they do believe that it is as verily come from heauen, as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeed is right worthis both to be largely entreated of and diligently weyed. But the readers shall pardon me if herein I rather regard what the proportion of the worke which I have begun may beare, then what the largenesse of the matter requireth. There is grown vp among the moft part of men a moſt hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authoritie as by common content of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuiolable truth of God did reſt vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great ſcorne of the holy Ghoſt, they aske of vs who can affure vs that these scriptures came from God: or who can asceraiine vs that they have continued vnto our age safe and vn corrupted: who can perfwade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently received, and that other to be striken out of the number of Scripture, vnlesse the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? It hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, and what booke are to be reckened in the canon thereof. So thee robbers of Gods honour, while they fecke vnder colour of the Church to bring in an vnbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they shewe both themſelves and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be believed among the simple, that the Church can do all things. But if it be fo: what shall become of the poore confences that fecke thefaſt affurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine there‐ of stande and bee ftailed onely vpon the judgement of men? When they receive fuch anwers, shall they ceafe to waier and tremble? Againe, to what feorners of the vngodly is our faith made fubiecit? into how great fulpiton with all men is it brought, if this be beleued, that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the fa‐avour of men?

2 But fuch bablers are well confuted euyn with one worde of the Apoffle. He teſtifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundation of the Prophets & Apoftles.

If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needs be, that the same doctrine stood in steadfast certainty, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well call, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof, yet it remained that full what is to be said of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the judgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning built upon the writings and preaching of the Apostles: wherefore that doctrine shal be found, the allowed credit thereof was surely before the Church, without which the Church itselfe had never been. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuise, that the Church had power to judge the scripture, so as the certainty of the scripture should be thought to hang upon the will of the Church. Wherefore, when the Church doth receive the scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should be in controversy, make it autentike and of credit: but because she acknowledgeth it to be the truth of her God, according to her due use of Godliness; without delay she doth honor it. Whereas they demand, how shall we be perswaded that it came from God, vnlesse we refer to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should aske, how shall we knowe light from darknesse, white from blacke, or sweete from sour. For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no lesse apparaent sense of her truth, than white and blacke thinges do of their colour, or sweet and sour thinges of taste.

3 I know that they commonly allege the saying of Augustine, where he faith that he would not beleue the Gospell, save that the authoritie of the Church moued him thereto. But how vntruely and cauiously it is alleged for such a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is easie to perceiue. He had to do with the Manichees, which required to be beleued without gain saying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their side, but prooved it not. And to make their Manichees to be beleued, they pretended the Gospell. Now Augustine asketh them what they would do, if they did light upon a man that would not beleue the Gospell of his owne self, with what maner of perwaision they would draw him to their opinion. Afterward he faith: I my selfe would not beleue the Gospell, &c. saue that the authoritie of the Church moued me thereto. Meaning that he himselfe, when he was a stranger from the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the Gospell for the assured truth of God, but by this, that he was overcome with the authoritie of the Church. And what may we call it, if a man not yet knowing Chri$t, have regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godlie is grounded upon the authoritie of the Church, nor meaneth that the certaintie of the gospell doth hang thereupon: but simply and only, that there should be no slurredines of the gospell to the infidels, whereby they might be won to Chri$t, vnlesse the consciet of the Church did drive them vnto it. And the same meaning a little before he doth plainly conforme in this saying: When I shall praise that which I beleue, and blame that which thou beleuest, what thinkst thou meere for vs to judge or do? But that we for sake such men as first call vs to come and know certaine truths, and after command vs to beleue things unceraine: and that we follow them that require vs first to beleue that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strong by beleuing, we may attaine to understand the thing that we beleue: not men now, but God himself inwardly strengthening & givings light to our mind. These are the verie words of Augustine: whereby every man may easilie gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credit that we have to the Scriptures upon the will and awardment of the Church, but only to shew this, (which we ourselves also do conforme to be true:) that they which are not yet lightened with the spirit of God, are brought by the reverence of the Church unto a willingnes to be taught, so they can finde in their hearts to learn the faith of Chri$t by the Gospell: and that thus by this means the authoritie of the Church Church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleue the Gospell. For, as we see, his minde is that the assurance of the godly be staid upon a far other foundation. Otherwise I doe not deny but that he often preseth the Manichies with the consent of the whole Church, when he seeketh to prooue the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproached Faustus for that he did not yeld himselfe to the truth of the Gospell so grounded, so stablished, so gloriously renowned and from the very time of the Apostles by certaine succession perpetually confirmed. But he never trauelleth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But onely this, which made much for him in the matter that he disputed of, he bringeth forth the vniuerfall judgement of the Church, wherein he had the advantage of his adversaries. If any desire a fullerprooef heretof, let him reade his booke concerning the profile of beleuing. Where he shall finde that there is no other readiness of beleefe commended vnto vs by him, but that which onely giuent vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a convenient beginning to inquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and sounde truth.

4. We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credite of this doctrine, is not establisht in vs, untill such time as we be vndoubtedly perswaded that God is the author thereof. Therefore the principall prooues of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apostles boast not of their owne inarpe wit or any such things as procure credite to men that speake: neither stande they vpon prooues by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compell the whole world to obedience. Now we haue to see how not only by probable opinion, but by apparant truth it is evident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfull pretended. If then we will provide well for conferences, that they be not continually carried about with vnsedfast doubting, not may waver, nor stay at evey small stop, this maner of perswasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, judgements or the conciiters of men, euin from the secret testimonie of the holy Ghost. True in deed it is, that if we lifted to worke by way of arguments, many things might be allledged that may easly prooue, if there be any God in heauen, that the lawe, the prophecies and the Gospell came from him. Yea, although men learned and of deep judgement would stand vp to the contrarie, and would imploy and shew forth the whole force of their wits in this disputation: yet if they be not so hardened as to become desperately shamefull, they would be compellled to confesse, that there are seene in the Scripture manieth tokens that it is God that speake therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shal se, that all the booke of the holy Scripture do far excell all other writings whatsoever they be. Yea, if we bring therefore pure eyes & vn corrupted senses, we shall find all the manifeste tokens that it is God that speake therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shall see, that all the booke of the holy Scripture do far excell all other writings whatsoever they be. Yea, if we bring therefore pure eyes & vn corrupted senses, we shall find that there is a manifeste tokens that it is God that speake therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine thereof is from heauen.

and the Prophet spake from God. But I answer, that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as onely God is a convenient witnesse of himselfe in his owne word, so shall the same word never finde credit in the hearts of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward witnesse of the holy Ghost. It behooueth therefore of necessitye that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophets, do enter into our hearts to perswade vs, that they faithfully uttered that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly fet forth by Esai in these words: My spirit which is in thee, and the wordes that I have put in thy mouth, and in the mouth of thy feede, shall not faile for euer. It greeueth some good men, that they have not ready at hand some cleere prove to alleage, when the wicked doe without punishment murmur against the worde of God. As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seal and a pledge, because vntill he do lighten mens minde, they do alway waver among many doubtings.

5 Let this therefore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwardly taught, do wholly reit upon the Scripture, and that the same Scripture is to be credited for it selfe fake, and ought not to bee made subject to demonstration and reasons: but yet the certeinie which it getreth among vs, it attains by the witnesse of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely majestie of it selfe it procureth reverence to be given to it: yet then onely it thoroughly pearceeth our affections, when it is sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost. So being lightned by his vertue, we doe then beleue, not by our owne judgement, or other mens, that the Scripture is from God: but above all mens judgement we hold it most certainly determined, even as if we beheld the majestie of God himselfe there present, that by the ministration of men it came to vs from the very mouth of God. We seeke not for arguments and likelihoods to rest our judgement vpon: but as to a thing without all compass of consideration, we submit our judgement and wisdome to it. And that not in such part as are wont sometyme hastily to take hold of a thing unknown, which after being thoroughly perceiv'd displeaseth them: but because we are in our consciences well assured that we hold an infallible truth. Neither in such part, as fally mens are wont to yeeld their minde in thraldom to superstitions, but because we undoubtedly perceiv'd in the strength and breathing of the divine majestie, wherewith we are drawn and stirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more happily and effectually than mans will or wit can attain. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophets with the whole people do beare his witnesses, because being taught by prophecyes they did undoubtedly beleue without guile or uncertainitie that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our perswasion, as requisite no reason: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, even such a one, where in the minde more affirmdly and steadfastly resteth, than vpon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceed but by revelation from heauen. I speake now of none other thing but that which every one of the faithful doeth by experience finde in himselfe, sauing that my words do much want of a full declaration of it. I leave heere many things vnspoke, because there will bee elsewhere againe a convenient place to treat of this matter. Onely now let vs know, that onely that is the true faith which the spirit of God doth seale in our hearts. Ye with this onely reason will the sober reader, and willing to learn, be contented. Esay promiseth, that all the children of the renewed church shall be the scullers of God. A singular priviledge therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect onely, whom he feuereth from all the rest of mankind. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cheerfulnesse to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses: as it is written: Say not in thy hart, who shall ascend into heauen, or who shall descend into the deepe? the wordes is euene in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of understanding be lade vp in store for his children, it is no manue not unlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seen such ignorance and dulness. The common multitude I call even the most excellent of them, until such time as they be grafted into the body of the church. Moreover Esa warning that the Prophets doctrine should seem incredible, not only to strangers but also to the Jews that would be accounted of the household of God, addeth this reason: because the arm of God shall not be revealed to all men. So oft therefore as the smallness of number of the believers both trouble us, on the other side let us call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is given.

The viij. Chapter.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proues to establish the credit of Scripture.

Vnlees we have this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any judgement of man, in vaine shall the authority of Scripture either be strengthened with arguments, or established with content of the church, or confirmed with any other means of defence. For vnlees this foundation be laid, it still remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, we have embraced it devoutly, and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become very fit helps, which before were but of small force to grasse and fasten the assurance thereof in our minde. For it is maruellous, howe great establishment growth hereof, when with earnest studie we consider howe orderly and well framed a disposition of the divine wisedome appeareth therein, how heavenly a doctrine in every place of it, and nothing usurping of earthinesse, howe beautifull an agreement of all the partes among themselves, and such other things as auable to procure a majestie to writings. But more perfectly are our harts confirmed when we consider howe we are euen violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, then with grace of words. For this also was not done without the singular providence of God, that the hie mysteries of the heauenly kingdom should for the most part be vittered vnder a contemptible baseness of wordes, least if it had bee beautified with more glorious speech, the wicked should caull that the onely force of eloquence doth rage therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doth raise vpon a greater reverence of it self then any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we judge, but that there is a more mightie strength of truth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any Art of wordes? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to proue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wisdome, because his preaching: among them was set forth not with cunning speech of mans wisdome, but in plainic evidence of the spirit and of power. For the truth is then set free from all doubting, when not vpholden by oracie: then it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But howe this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, bee they never so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to perceiue our affections. Reade Demosthenes or Cicero, reade Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I grant they shall maruellously allure, delute, moove, and rauih thee. But if from them thou comest to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so lively moove thy affections, it shall so pærce thy hart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacie of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in maner vanishe away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: do in deede breath out a certaine divinitie.

2. I grant indeede that some of the Prophets have an elegant, cleare, yea, and a beautiful phrase of speech, so as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shew that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vied a rude and groffe style. But whether a man read David, Elsay, and such like, who have a sweete and pleafant flowing speech, or Amor, the Heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke sauoueth of countrie rudenes: in euery one of themfull appeare that maiftie of the holy Ghost that I speake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfaier of God, that with deceitfull resembled he might the better crepe into simple mens minde: so hath he crafely spred abroad with rude and manner barbarous speech those wicked errors wherewith he deceived silly men; and hath oftentimes vied discouerted phrases, that under such visor he might hide his deceit. But howe vaine and vnreall is that curious counterfaier, all men that haue but meane understanding do plainly fee. As for the holy Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the Prophets be looked vpon, there shall not one be founde among them, but he hath faire excelled all mans capacitie, in such sort that those are to be thought, to have no judgement of taste to whom their doctrine is vnfaurorie.

3. Other men have largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a fewe things, that chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Beside these points that I haue alreadie touched, the very antiquitie of the Scripture is of great weight. For howsoever the Greeks writers tell many fables of the Egyptian divinitie: yet ther remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Mofes. And Mofes deuident not a new God, but made forth the same thing which the Israelites had receiued in long proces of time, conueied to them by their fathers, as it were from hande to hande concerning the everlafting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the co- tent made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing never heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needes be that the deliuerance from bondage, wherein they were detaine, was a thing well and commonly knowne among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did soorely raffe vp all their minde. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC yeeres. Nowe it is to be considered, if Mofes which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the originall deliuerance of his doctrine: howe much the holie Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie?

4. Vnliefe perhaps some lift to beleue the Egyptians, that stretch their auncientie to fixe thousand yeeres before the creation of the worlde. But fift their vnliefe babling hath beene alwayes scorned euem of all the prophane writers themselues, there is no cauе why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Appion, allegegeth testimonies worthie to be remembred out of auncient writres, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath been famoue euem from the first ages, altho' it were neither readnor truly known. Now, that neither there should remaine to the malicous any cause of suspicion, nor to the wicked any occasion to caulis, God hath for both these dangers provided good remedies. When Mofes rehearseth what Iacob almost three hundred yeeres before had by heauenly inspiration pronounced vpon his owne posteritie, how doth he set forth his owne tribe? yea, in the person of Levi he set forth it with eternall infamie. Symeon (faith he) and Levi the vehiels of wickednesse. My soule cometh not into their counfell, nor my toong into their secret. True witt, he might have paffed over that blot with silence, in so doing not onelie to please his Father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole familie with part of the same shame. How can that writer bee suspected, which vncontrainedlie publiling by the oracle of the holy Ghost, God the Creator. Lib. I. 14

Num. 12.

14. That the principal ancestor of the family whereof himselfe descended was an abominable doer, neither privately professed for his owne honor, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kin­dred, whom undoubtedly this matter greeued? When also he reheareseth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his own brother, and Ma­rie his sister: shall we say that he spake after the meaning of the fleth, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreover, the himselfe was hieft in authoritie, why did he not leave at least the office of the hee priesthood to his owne kindred, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touch heere onely a fewe things of many. But in the lawe it selfe a man shal each where meeke with many arguments that are able to bring full proofe to make men beleue that Moses without all question commeth from heaven as an Angel of God.

Now these so many and so notable myracles that hee recounteth, are euen as many establishments of the lawe that he delivereth, and the doctrine that he published. For this that he was carried in a cloude vp into the mountaine: that there euen to the fortieth day he continued without companie of men: that in the very publishing of the lawe his face did shone as it were before with sunne beames: that lightnings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard each where in the aire: that a trumpet sound newly unfouned with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloud fett betwixxe, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so myraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chor, Da­than, and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the roke striken with a rod did by and by wouvre foorth a ricer: that at his praire it rained Manna from heaven: did not God hereby commend him from heaven as an vndoubted Prophet? If any man object against me, that I take these things as confessed, which are not out of controverfe, it is easie to answer this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assemblie published all these things, what place was there to faine before those witneffes that had themselues seen the things done? It is likely forsooth that he woule come among them, and rebuking the people of infidellie, stubbornnes, vntaungfulnesse, and other filmes, would have boasted that his doctrine was establised in their owne sight with such myracles, which indeed they neuer fawe.

6. For this is also worthise to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any myracles, hee therewithall odioufly joyneth fuch things as might stirre the whole people to cry out against him, if there had beene neuer fo little occasion. Whereby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were euermore than sufficiently convinced by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlie known, than that the prophane could deny that myracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministered them another cauillation, saying, that they were done by Magical arts and forcerie. But what like proofe have they to accuse him for a forcerer, which so far abhorred from fuch superflition, that he commandeth to stone him to death, that doth but ask counsel of forcerers and footholders? Truly no such deceufer vseth his juggling crafts, but that he studieth to amaze the minds of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth onely execute those things that God hath appointed, hee doth sufficiently wipe away all blots of thinking euill of him. Nowe if the things thenselues be considered, what enchantment could bring to passe, that Manna daily raining from heaven, should suffe to feede the people? And if anie man kept in store more than his full measure, by the very roting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great prooues God sufferd hisfervant to be tried, that nowe the wicked can nothing pveaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudlie and impudently make intirrections, sometime dutes of them conspiring among themselues were about to overthrow the holy fervant of God: how.

how could he have beguiled their futor with illusions? And the ende that followed plainly sheweth, that by this means his doctrine was stablished to continue to the ende of all ages.

7 Moreover where he assigneth the chiefe gouvernement to the tribe of Juda in the person of the Patriarch Jacob, who can deny that this was done by spirit of prophecy, specially if we woy in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it proued true? Imagine Moses to have been the first author of this prophecy: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there past fower hundred yeeres wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Juda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome should rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When David was appointed by Samuel, what reason appeare there why the course of inheritance of the kingdome should be changed? who would have looked that there should have come a king out of the base house of a heerdman? And when there were in the fame house, feuen brethren, who would have said that that honour should light upon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this appointment was governed by any arte, travaell or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heavenly prophecy? Likewise thofe things that Moses afore speake the, albeit darkly, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the covenants of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeers after, doe they not make it plaine, that he spake by the inspiration of God? I ouerskip his other tellings aforland of things, which doe so evidently favour of the revelation of God, that all men that have their found wit may plainly perceive that it is God that spake the. To be short, that fame one song of his, is a cleere looking glaffe, where inevidently appeareth.

8 But in the other Prophets the fame is yet also much more plainly seene. I will choose out onely a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdome of Juda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some fay and defence, then did Esay prophesie of the destruction of the citie and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such things as at that time seemed falle, and afterward proued true: yet those prophecies that he uttereth concerning their deliverance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There past more then an hundred yeeres from the time that Esay spake before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeere or thereabouts after the death of Esay. No man could then geffe that there shoulde be any fuch Cyrus, that should have warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subiect to mightie a monarchical under his dominion, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Israel. Doeth not this bare telling without any garnishment of wordes evidently shewe, that the things that Esay spake, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and not the coniectures of men? Againie, when Ieremia a little before that the people were caried away, did determine the ende of the captivity within three score and ten yeeres, and promised returne and libertie, muft it not needs be that his toong was governed by the spirit of God? What fame like frame shall it be to deny, that the credite of the Prophets was stablished by fuch prooues, and that the fame thing was fulfilled in deed, which they themselves doe report to make their sayings to be beleued. Beholde, the former things are come to passe, and new things doe I declare: before they come forth, I tell you of them. I can to speake howe Ieremia and Ezechiel being fo farre asunder, yet prophesying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endyted the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of fize hundred yeeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an historie of things already done and commonly known? These things if godly men have well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plain proofe hereof is too cleere to be subject to any caullations at all.

9 I know what some learned men doe prate in corners, to shew the quicknes of their wit in assuiling the truth of God. For they demand, who hath assered vs that these things which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moses & the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardie to move this question, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cures: who would not say, that such madnisse were worthie to be corrected with strokes and stripes? The lawe of Moses hath beene marvellously preferred, rather by heavenly providence then by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priests it lay buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly king Josias found it, it hath full by continual fascination from age to age bin vfed in the hands of men. Neither did Josias bring it forth as an vnknown or new thing, but such a thing as had beene euer commonly published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The original booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records. Only this had happened, that the Priests had ceased to publish the lawe according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselves had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had David in their hands, knew they not of Moses? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certaine that their writings came to posteritie none other wise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall ordely course of yeares delivered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, and partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

10 As for that which they object out of the historie of the Machabees, to minish the credit of Scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be defuid more fit to stablishe the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon themselues the engine that they raile vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commanded all the bookees to be burned, whence are come those copies that we now haue? On the other side I ask them, in what shope they could so soone be made? It is evident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediately abraode againe, and were without controuerstie known to be the same of all godly men, that having beene brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly know them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were confin'd together, did insolently triumphant reproches vpon the Jews, yet newer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookees. For whatsoever they thinke the Jews religion to be, yet still they think Moses to be the author of it. What then doe these praters else, but bewray their owne more then doggish frowardnesse, while they falsely say, that these bookees are changed, and new put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approoued by consent of all historyes? But to spende no more labour vainely in confuting such foolish caullations: let vs rather hereby consider howe great a care God had for the preseruation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men he suaued it from the outrage of the most cruel tyrants, as out of a presernt fire: that he endured the godly priests and other with so great constancie, that they staid not to redeeme this booke without the losse of their life if neede were, and so to couerty it euer to posteritie: that he disappointe the narrow search of so many gouernours and souldiers. Who can but acknowledge the notable and miracullous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to have beene utterly destroyed, by and by came abroade againe as fully restor'd, and that The mysteries which the three Evangelists deliver in simple speech, the thundering majesty of John, the rude education of the Apostles before they became teachers, S. Paul's cruel death. And the doctrine of the new Testament from the conception of profane men.

Now if we come to the new Testament, with how sound pillars is the truth thereof upheld? The three Evangelists write the history in base and simple speech. Many proud men do eloath that simplicitie, because they take no heed to the chief points of doctrine therein, whereby it were easy to gather, that they intreate of heavenly mysteries above mans capacitie. Surely wholesouer hath but one drop of honest frame shall be aghast if they read the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the fume whereof is shortly comprised by these three Evangelists, doe easily deliver their writing from all contemnt. But John thundering from an high, whose whom he compelled not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbornesse more mightily then any thunderbolte. No we let come foorth all these shapen eolofed fultfinder, that have a great pleasure to make the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens harts, let them reade John's Gospel: Will they or no, they shall there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blinde, yet the very heavenly majesty in them holdeth all men bound, and as they were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doth sufficiently advancie their doctrine above the world, that Matthew being before al giuen to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter and John brought vp in their fisher boats, all groffe unlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might delier to other. Paul, not onely from a professor, but also from a cruell and bloudie enimie converted to a new man, with sudden and unhopet change doth shew, that being compelled by heavenly authoritie, he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogs deny, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them disfigure the historie: yet still the truth is felt openly crieth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time delpseed men among the rascal people, suddenly began to gloriously to intreate of heavenly mysteries.

12. There be yet also furthermore many verie good reasons, why the content of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the wils of so many ages have constantly agreed to obey it. And that howsoever Satan with all the worlde hath tormbled by maruelous meanes, either to oppresse it, or overthrow it, or utterly to blot and deface it out of mens remembrance, yet ever still like a palme tree, it hath riven... risen vp aboue, and remained incnincible. For there hath not lightly bene in old time any sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellent whan other, but he hath bent his force against this Scripture: yet they all haue nothing proued. The whole power of the eart hath armed it selfe to destroy it, and yet all their enterprizes are vanisihed away, as in smoke. How coulde it haue refisted being so mightily on each side assailed, if it haue had none other defence but manes? Yea, rather it is hereby proued, that it came from God himselfe, that all the travels of men striving against it, yet it hath of her owne power full risen vp. Beside that, not one citie alone, nor one only nation hath agreed to receive and embrace it: but so faire as the world extendeth in length and breadth, the Scripture hath attained her crede, by one holy conspiracie of divers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreeable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of minds so divers and disagreeing in manner in all things else, ought much to mounse vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heavenly maieftie: no small effimiation grown vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that doe agree, I meane not of them all, but only of those, with whom as with lights it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assurednesse of minde ought we to submit vs to that doctrine which we haue stablished and witnessed with the bloud of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldly without feare, yea and with great cheerefullnesse to die for it: how should it thent come to passe, that we hauing it conveyed to vs with such an aflured pledge, should not with certaine and vnooouteable perswasion take hold of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath bene feeld with the bloud of so many witness, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witnesse of their faith: and not of a frantike dissemblence of braine, as sometime the erroneous spirits are woont to doe, but with a firme & constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maieftie, not only acertained vnto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of caullers, yet be they such as be not of themselves sufficiently available to bring sleepe to credite vnto it, untill the heavenly father disclosing therein his maieftie, doe bring the reuerence thereoff oat of all controuersie. Wherefore then only the scripture shall suffice to that knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certantie thereof shall be grounded vpon the inward persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that sue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as second helps of our weaknesse they follow that chiefe and highest testimonie. But they do fondly that will haue it perwaded by proofe to the vnfaithfull, that the scripture is the word of God, which cannot be knowne but by faith. For good reason therefore doeth Augustine giue warning, that godlines and peace of minde ought to go before, to make a man understand somwhat of so great matters.

That those fanaticall men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto revelation, do overthrow all the principles of godliness.

Now they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with error, as to be carried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirte, both themselues doe forsake all reading, and also doe scorn their simplicitie which full follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine knowe of these men, what certe that is, by whose inspiration they are carried vp so high, that they dare despise the

the doctrine of the scriptures as childish and base. For if they answer that it is the spirit of Christ, then such carlessnesse is woorthie to be laughed at. For I think they will grant, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithful in the primitive Church were lightned with none other spirit. But none of them did learne of that spirit to dispose the word of God: but rather every one was moued more to reverence it, as their writings doe most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Efai. For where he saith: My spirit that is upon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the olde people to the outward doctrine, as though they were set to learne to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true and perfect felicitie of the new Church under the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, then by the spirit of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewe men with wicked sacriledge doe feuer alander those things that the Prophet hath ioned with an inuiolable knot. Moreover, Paul being raised vp into the third heauen, yet ceaseth not to goe forward in the doctrine of the lawe and the Prophets, even so as he exhorteth Timothie, a doctour of singular excellencie to apply reading. And woorthie is that commendation to be remembered, wherewith he setteth forth the scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teache, to admonish and to reprooue, that the seruants of God may be made perfect. How diuellish a madnesse is it to faine, that the vfe of Scripture is but transtorie, and lafteth but for a while: which in deed guideth the children of God euene to the last ende? Again, I would haue them answer me this: whether they have taunted of another spirit then that which the Lord promiseth to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not carried with such giddinesse, that they doe so boaste. But what manner of spirit did he speake of in his promise? even that spirit which should not speake of his selues, but should minister and inspire into their minde those things, which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his word. It is not therefore the office of the spirit, which is promiseth vs, to faine newe and vnheard of receitations, or to coune a new kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the received doctrine of the Gospell, but to seale in our minde the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospell.

By the scripture the spirit is tried whether it be of God or no. Neither is it dishonrable for the spirit so to be tried.

2. Whereby we plainly vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we lift to take any vse and fruite of the spirit of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedefull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to haue gien place after the rising of the light of the Gospell. On the other side, if any spiritie learning the wisdome of the word of God doeth thrust vnso vs another doctrine, that the same spiritie ought rightfully to be suspected of vanitie and lying. For what? when Sathan transformed himselfe into an angell of light, what credite shall the holy Ghoft haue among vs, if it be not feuerally known by some affured mark? And truely it hath beene plainly pointed out vnso vs by the worde of the Lorde, but that these miserable men doe willingly count to err in their owne destruction, while they seek a spiritie rather from themselues than from him. But (say they) it is dishonorable, that the spiritie of God, whom all things ought to obey, should be subiect to the Scripture. As if this were a dishono-mous to the holy Ghoft to be coryer where egall and like to it selfe, to agree with it selfe in all things, and no where to varde. In deed, if it were to be tried by the rule either of men, or of Angels, or any others rule whatsoever, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obediencie, or if ye lift fo to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it selfe, when it is considered in it selfe, who can therefore say, that there is any wrong done vnso it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleaure to haue his majestie established. It ought to content vs so soone as he entreth into vs. But least vnder his his name the spirit of Satan should cleepe in, he will hauet vs to knowe him by that image of himselfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. He is the author of the Scriptures: he cannot be divers and unlike himselfe. Therefore it must needs be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed himselfe therein. This is no dis-honor vnto him, vnlesse perhaps wee count it honorable to swarde and goe out of kinde from himselfe.

3 Whereas they caull that we rest vpon the letter that saith, heer in they suffer punishment for despising of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paul there contends against the falfe Apostles, which commending the law without Christ did call away the people from the benefite of the new Testament, wherein the Lord doth couenant that he will grage his law within the bowels of the faithfull, and write it in their harts. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killed the Readers of it, when it is feuered from the grace of Christ, and not touching the heart, one ly foundeth in the eares. But if it be effectuall printed in our harts by the holy ghost, if it present Christ vnto vs: then is it the worde of life, converting soules, giving wisedome to little ones, &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the minisiterie of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so stricke fast in his truth which he hath expressed in the Scriptures, that then one he putreth forth and displaie his force, when the Scripture hath her due reverence and dignitie. And if disagree not herewith which I before saide, that the worde it selfe is not much assured vnto vs, vnlesse it be confirmed by the witnesse of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuell knot the Lorde hath coupled together the assurance of his worde and of his spirit, so that perfect reverence to the worde doth then settle in our minde when the holy Ghost shiueth vpon vs to make vs therein behold the face of God: and on the other side without all feare of being deceived we doe embrace the holy Ghost, when we reknowledge him in his owne image, that is, in his word. Thus it is undoubtedly: God brought not abroad his word among men for a sodaine fiew, meaning at the comming of his spirit by and by to take it away againe, but he after sent the same spirit with whose power he had distributed his worde, to make an end of his worke with effectuall confirmation of his worde. In this Iort Christ opened the minde of the two disciples, not that they should cast away the Scriptures and ware wise of themselues, but that they shoulde understand the Scriptures. Likewise Paul when he exhorteth the Thessalonians not to extinguih the spirit, doth not carrie them vp on high to vaine speculations without the worde, but by and by faith further,that propheyes are not to be despised: whereby without doubt is ment, that the light of the spirit is choked vp so soone as propheyes come to be despised. What say these proudly dwelling men, ravished with the spirit, to these things, which reken this onely to be an excellent illumination, when carelesly forsaking and saying farewell to the worde of God, they both boldly and rashly doe take holde of all that they have conceiued in their sleepe? Truly, a faire other obliquetie bemooth the children of God: which as they see that without the spirit of God they are voide of all light of truth, so do they know that the worde is the instrument where with the Lorde分布eth to the faithfull the light of his spirit. For they knowe none other spirit but that which dwellt and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continuallly called to the hearing of the worde.

The x. Chapter.

That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

But because we have shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the worlde and all the creatures is somewhat plainely set forth, is yet more familiarly...

familiarly and plainly declared in the word: now is it good to consider, whether the Lord showed himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his worke. But I shall at this time be contented only to point vnto it, whereby the godly minde being admonished, may know what is chiefly to be searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I do not yet touch the peculiar covenant, whereby God seuered the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For even then he appeareth the redeemer in receaving to his children by free adoption those that before were enemies. But we are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creation of the world, and ascended not to Christ the mediatour. And altho\u2019by and by it shall be good to allege certaine places out of the newe Testament, for as much as even out of it both the power of God the Creator and his prouidence in prefering of the first nature is approoued, yet I warne the Readers before, what is now my purpose to do, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heaven and earth doth governo the world by him created. Euerie where is renou\u2019med both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his steverie, which shewes him to be a righteous punisher of wicked dooings, specially where his sufferance nothing prevaileth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions, wherein his natural face is as in an image represented to be scene. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehende all that was lawfull for men to understand of God. The Lorde (faith he) the Lorde, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercy vnto thousand, which takest away iniquitie and wicked dooings, before whom the innocent shall not be innocent, which renderst the wickednesse of the fathers to the children andchildren children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeating of that honourable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is descripte vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stande in a Lucie feeling, than in an emiptie and supernatuall speculation. And here we doe heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen & earth, that is to say, clemercie, bountie, mercie, juytice, judgement and truth. For might and power are contained vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition doe the Prophets set forth them when they make fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I woulde not have vppg too many examples together, at this present let one Psalm suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened versus, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly doe we perceiue God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde. In Jeremiah where he pronounceth, what a one he would have vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, yet comming all to one effect. Hee that glorieth, faith he, let him glorifie in this that he knoweth me to be the Lorde that doth mercie, justice, and judgement on the earth. Surely, these three things are very necessarie for vs to know: Mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Judgement, which is daily executed upon cuill dooers, and more greuous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Justice, whereby the faithfull are preferred and most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou ha\u2019st conceiued, the prophecy faith, thou ha\u2019st sufficiently enough whereof thou maist glory in God. And yet heere are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stande faire which is here required of his justice, mercy and judgement, unless it did rest vpon his vmoouesable truth? And howe should we beleue that he doth governo gouerne the earth with justice and judgement, but understanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodness? If then all his waies be mercie, judgement and justice, in them must holinesse also needs be seene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge of God that is set forth vno vs in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth imprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the ende we may learne first to honour him with perfect innocencie of life and vn-fained obedience, and then to hang altogether upon his goodness.

But here I meane to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct vs to the true God, doth expresselie exclude, and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath beene corrupted. True it is indeed that the name of one God was every where known and renowned. For euery that worshipped a great number of gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simplie vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Infine the martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engraven in the harts of all men. The same thing also doth Tertullian prooue by the common phrase of speech. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawn or fallen to false forged deuices, and to their senes become vaine, therefore all that euere they naturally understood of the being but one God, awaited no further, but to make them inexusable. For euery the wist of them do plainly shewe the wandring error of their minde, when they with some god to affit them, and so in their prayers do call vpon vncertaine gods. Moreover in this that they imagined God to haue manie natures, although they thought somewhat lesse absurdly than the rude people did of Jupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerva and other; yet were they not freed from the deceits of Satan, & as we have already faide elsewhere, whatsoeuer waies of escape the Philosophers have suitably invented, they cannot purge themselves of rebellion, but that they all haue corrupted the truth of God. For this reason Habacuc after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to selle God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admit him to be any other than such as he had disclosd himselfe by his worde.

That it is unlawfull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, and that generall they for false God, so manie as doe erect to themselfes any images.

But as the Scripture prooving for the rude and grosse wit of man, vifth to speake after the common manner: so when it meaneth to make leterall known the true God from the false Gods, it checkely comparith him with idoles: not that it doth allowe those intenotions that are more suttely and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlifer to disclose the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madnesse in seeking God so long as they cleave cuterie one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusie definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that maner of godhead, that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the onlye convenient vittues of himselfe. In the mean time, wth this brutish grossenes hath posseted the whole world, to couet visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselves gods of timber, stone, gold, sluer, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to holde this principle, that with wicked falshood the glorie of God is corrupted, so oft as any shape is fained to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glory of his deittie to himselfe alone, alone, meaning to teach vs what maner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediately: Thou shalt make thee no graven image, nor any similitude, in which words he restraineth our liberty, that we attempt not to represent him with any visible image. And there he shortly recketh vp all the formes wherewith of long time before, superstitioun had begun to pervert his truth into lying. For we know that the Peris worshipped the Sun, yea, and so many stars, of the foolish nations saw in the skie, so many gods they stakken them. And scarce was there any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians thought to be wiser then the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meete to be veiled, but without any exception he rejected all images, pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to have God neere vnto them.

2 This is cause to be gathered by the reasons which he joyneth to the prohibition.
First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou hearkest a voice, but thou sawest no bodie. Therefore take heed to thy self, lest peraduenture thou be deceived and make to thy selfe any likeness, &c. We fee how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfeit shapes, that we may knowe that they forfake God whooseuer do couet to have visible formes of him. Of the Prophets only Ezy shall be enough, which speaketh off and much hereof, to teach that the majesty of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish counterfaite, when beeing without bodie, is likened to bodily matter: beeing invisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lumpe of timber, stone or golde. In like manner reasoneth Paul: For as much as we are the generation of GOD, we ought not to think that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone graven by art and the invention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, that the other images are erected, or pictures painted to express the shape of God, they simply dispresse him as certaine dishonors of his majestie. And what maruell is it if the holy Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heauen, with whom he compeleth the very wretched and blind idolaters themselves to confesse this in earth? It is known how Seneca complained as it is to read in Augustinus. They dedicate (faith he) the holy immortal and inuiolable Gods in most vil and basse stuffe, and put vp them the shapes of men and beaues, and some of them with kind of man and woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodyes, &c. which they call Gods, which if they should receive breath & meet them, would be reckned monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fond caullation wherewith the defenders of images fecke to escape, which say that the Jews were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstitioun. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God brought forth of his eternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul speake not to the Jews but to the Atheniensese when he confuted their error in counterfeiting a shape of God.

3 God indeed, I grant, sometime in certaine signes hath given a presence of his godhead, so as he was faide to be beholden face to face, but all these signes that cuer he shewed, did aptly serve for means to teach, and withall did plainly admoniished men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloude and fire and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glorie, yet did they as it were be bridele and restrain the minds of men, that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherfore, not Moses himselfe, to whom God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparotion of other, obtained by praiere to see that face, but received this sunfuerre, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared under the likeness of a Daue, but sith he immediately vanished away, who doth not see but that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleuwe him to be an infinite spint, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a forehewing of the revealing that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Jews to abuse this pretence to erect to themselves a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercie state wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made, as it might teach that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens minde is carried beyonde themselves with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroad did cover it, the veile did hide it, and the place itselfe being set farre inward, did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is very plaine that they be verie madde, that goe about to defend the images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shewe that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? for as much as they were made for this purpose, that hiding the mercie state with their wings, they should not only keep backe the eies of man, but also all his fenses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardineffe. For this purpose maketh it, that the Prophets described the Seraphins shewed them in a vision, with their face uncovered: whereby they signifie, that so great is the brightness of the glorye of God, that the Angels themselves are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawn from our eies. Although yet so many as rightly judge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom we nowe speake, pertayned onely to the olde manner of introduction, as it were of children, vsed in the lawe. So to drawe them nowe for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for which such rudiments were appointed. And it is much shame, that the paime writers are better expounders of the law of God than the Papists are. Immanuel reprocheth the Jews, as it were in scorne, that they honor the white clouds and the deite of heauen. I grant he speake thin and wickedly: and yet he speake more truly in saying that they have among them no image of God, than the Papistes do which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hot hastines, brake our oftentimes to seeke them idols, euen as waters out of a great fesh spinge boil out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatrie, lefta wrongh upon the Jews the blaine of that fault which is common to all, we sleepe a deadly sleepe vnder vaine allurements to sinne.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying: The idols of the Gentiles are gold and siluer, euin the workes of mens hands. Because the Prophet doth gather of the stufte it selfe, that they are no gods that have a golden or siluer image: and he taketh it for confessd truth, that it is a foolish fainted intention whatsoever we conceive of our owne sense concerning God. He nameth rather gold & siluer, than clay or stone, that the beautye or the price should not seue to bring a reuerence to idols. But he concludes generally, that nothing is lesse allowable, than gods to be made of dead stufte. And in the mean time while he stands thus much upon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a rashnesse, which themselves bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vanish away at euerie moment, yet dare giue the honor of God to idols. Man must needs confess that himselfe is but a creatoure of a daies continuance, & yet he wil have a piece of metal to be counted God, to which himselfe gave the beginning to be a God. Wherefore came the beginning of idols but from the wil of men? Very fitfully doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt:

I was sometime a fig tree low, a blocke that stond for nought:
The workman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A forrme to fit upon, or else a Priap God to be.
At length he thought better was a God to make of me.

Forsooth

Forsooth an earthy silly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner cuerie moment, by his workmanship shall convey the name and honour of God to a dead stocke. But forasmuch as Epicure in scoffingly setting hath cared for no religion, let vs leave the taunts of him and such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet prick vs, or rather thrust vs through where he faith, that they are too much beatenly writeth that with one selfe piece of wood do make a fire and warme themselves, do heat the oven to bake bread, do rost or seethe flesh, & do make them a God before which they fall down humbly to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reprooch them that they have not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse convenient than to bring God to the meaoure of suche footes which is aboue all meaoure and incomprehensible. And yet this fame monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custom sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreouer hold in mind, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speech, that they are the works of mens hand which want the authority of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men do devise of themselves are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalm doth amplifie the madneffe of them that therefore are indued with understanding, that they should know that all things are mooed with the only power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead and fenseloffe. But because the corruption of nature carrieth as well all nations, as each man privately to so great madnes, at first the holy Ghost thundareth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them, that make them become like to them, and so many as trust in them. And it is to bee noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden then a grauen image, whereby the fond subterie of the Greeks is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they do more licentiousely outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not only to be made by the grauer, but also to be counterfaited by any other workman, because such counterfaite is cuil and to the dishonor of his majestie.

5. I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens books. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth fare otherwise, in whose school if Gregorie had beene taught, he would never so have spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly faith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyers: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoever men learn by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophets reprooue them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I grant that to be true. But I add further that which is calld for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papits take for an adhered principle, that images are in stead of books. For they do in comparison set images against God as things directly contrary, and such as never can agree together. This comparison I say is made in these places which I have allaged. Sich there is but one true God whom the Jews did worship, it is as it were and falsely done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceived, that thereby seeme for knowledge of God. Finally, if it were not true that it is a deceitfull and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I win of them when we use that it is vanitie and lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehaereful word for word that which the Prophets haue taught.

6. Let beread what Laelanius and Eusebius haue written of this matter, which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whom images are to be feene. Likewise Augustine which without doubting pronounceth that it is unlawful not only to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet saith he none other thing but the same which many yeeres before was decreed by the Elizbertines Councell, whereof this is the xxxv. Chapter. It is ordained that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honored and worshipped be not painted on the walle. But most notable is that which in another place Augustine allageth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne affent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both tooke away the feare of God, and brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peraduenture it shou'd be by small authority. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed, that a heathen man groping in dark-nesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnumeet for the mainfie of God, because they diminish the feare of God, and encrease error in men. The profe it selfe witnessed that this was no leffe truely than wisely spoken.
But Augustine having borrow ed it of Varro, bringeth it forth as of his owne minde.
And first he admonisht, that the first errors where with men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, encreased by the; Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore minisht or rather taken away thereby, because his mainfie may easely in the follishnes, & in the fond & absurd forging of images grow to contempt. Whose second thing I would to God we did not by proof find to be true. Wholoeuer therefore wil couet to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learneth than of images, what is meeet to be known concerning God.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes have any blame, let them no more vs this flutt to say that images are lay mens booke, which by many testimonies of Scripture are fo openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet shoulde they not much get thereby for defence of their idols What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well known. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot and vnclenehesse, whereunto if any woulde fathon himselfe, he were woorthy to be beaten with staues? Surely, the brothelhous-es can shew harlots more chaftely and soberly attired, than their temples fictive images of these whom they woulde called virgins. Even as vncomely array gue they to the Martyrs. Let them therefore fathion their idols at leaft to som honest thew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lie in saying, that they are the books of some holines. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithfull people in holy places, whom God woulde have there instructed with far other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his worde & in his holy mysteries: whereunto they shewed themselves to have a minde not verie heedfull, that caft their eies about to behold images. But whome do the Papistes call lay & vnlearned men whose vnskilfulnes may be to be taught only by images? Forsoth even those whom the Lord knowledge for his disciples, to whom he vouch-safeth to reueile the heavenly wisdome, whom he willeth to be instructed with the wholome mysteries of his kingdome. I grant indeed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such booke. But whence I praine you growth that dulnes, but that they are defraused of that doctrine which only was meere to instruct them with: For it is for no other caufe, that they which had the cure of churches gave out their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dumb. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospel, painted out in a maner crucified before our eies. To what purpose then were it to have commonly set vp in churches so many croffes of woode, stone, siluer and golde, if this were well and faithfully beaten into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curfe upon the croffe, to cleene our finnes with the sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his bloud, and finally to reconcile vs to God the Father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand croffes of wood or stonke. For perhaps the couetous do set their mindes & eies faster upon the golden & siluer croffes, As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the book of wisdom, that they were the first authors of them, which gave this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I grant that this custom was very ancient, and I deny not that it was the firebrand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry, did more and more burne therein. Yet do I not grant that this was the first originall of this mischief. For it appeareth by Moses that images were vfed before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in. When he calleth that Rachel had stole her fathers idols, hee speaketh it as of a common fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continual worship of idols. After the general flood, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many yeeres but that men according to their own lust fained them gods. And it is likely that the holy Patriarch yet living, his childrens children were given to idolatry, so that his bitter griefe he sawe the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible judgement. For Thare and Nachor even before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Israels firstsith. Seeing the generation of Sem so stone was vvaried, what shall we judge of the posteritie of Cham, who were alreadie cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride & rash boldnes, presumpth to imaging god according to his own conceit: as it is poisned with dulnes, yet, overwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceiveth vanitie and a fonde fantastie in stead of God. And in these enus is added a new mischief, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a god as he inwardly concieveth. Thus the minde begetteth the idol, & the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites prooveth that this was the beginning of idolatery, that men do not beleue that God is among them, vnsles he shew himself carnally present. We know not (sith they) what is becom of this Moses make vs gods that may go before vs. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not beleue that he was nie vnto them, vnsles they did see with their eies a corporall representation of his face to be a witness vnto them of the God that governed them. Their minde was therefore to knowe by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfeit deceit like it false, wherein it may vainly delight as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages since the creation of the world, men to obey this blinde desire have erected signes wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnall eies.

9 After such inention forging, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in the. At length being both with minde and eies altogether fastned thereon, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and have them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were persuaded in some gross opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selue either God or a creature in the image, when thou falles downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expresse a likenesse of him, but also anie tiles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soone as they have forged a visible forme for God, they also tie the power of God vnto it. So heathly foolish are men, that there they fasten neither God where they counterfeit him, and therefore must they needs worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idol, or God in the idol. This is always idolatry, when honors due to God are given to an idol, under what colour soever it be. And because God will not be worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is given to idols is taken from him. Let them take heed hereunto, that they seek for pretences to defend the abominable idolatry, wherein these manie ages past, true religion hath beene drowned and overthrown. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Jewes themselves so perversely to forget that it was God by whose hands they had beene brought out of Egypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron said, that those were the gods by whom they were delivered out of the land of Egypt, they boldly asserted, shewing a plain token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God that was their deliverer, so that they might see him go before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleued that the heathen were so grosse as to believe, that God was no other thing but stocks & stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but still they kept the same gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images name them many gods. Besides that they did daily consecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine faith were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common answer was, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deity that did in it invisible dwell. And they that were of somewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worship the image, nor the spirit in it, but by the corporal image they did behold the signe of that thing which they ought to worship? Howe then? All Idolaters, whether they were of the Jewes, or of the Gentiles were none otherwise minded than as I have saide: being not contented with a spiritual understanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure and nearer imprinted in them. After once that Iuch disordered counterfeitng of God well liked them, they never ended till daily more and more deluded with new deceits, they imagined that God did shew forth his power in images. And nevertheless, both the Jewes were persuaded that under Iuch images they did worship the one true Lord of heaven and earth: and likewise the Gentiles, their false gods, whom yet they signified to dwell in heaven.

10. Whosoeuer denie that it hath thus beene done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lie. For, why fall they downe before them? And when they praise, why turne they towarde them as to the cares of God? For it is true that Augustine faith, that no man praieth, or worshieth when he so beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in minde, that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will do for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference betweene the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reverence or none done to it, they honour another solemnly? Why do they wearie themselves with vowed pilgrimages to visit those images whereof they have like at home? Why doe they at this day in defense of them as were for their Religion and countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort as they would better suffer to have the one only God that their idols to be taken from them? And yet I do not reckon up the grosser errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and doe in manner pollute the hearts of all men. I do only shew what themselves do confesse when they mean most of all to excuse themselves of idolatry. We do not call them (say they) our gods. No more did the Jewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets each where caesenot to cast in their teeth their fornication with stocks and stones, for doing no more but Iuch things as are daily done by them that would be counted Christians, that is to saie, that they carnally worshipped God in stocks and stones.

11. Although
Cap. II. Of the knowledge of

The difference that they purport between themselves and idolaters is but a shift. They are not acquitted from the same sin because they give it another name.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor think good to passe it over, as if I knew it not, how they seek to escape with a more subtle distinction, whereof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worship which they give to images, is Idolatria, which is service of images, and not Idolatria which is worship of images. For so to term it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, give vnto images and pictures that worship which they call Deudia, or service. And so they think themselves without blame, if they be but the servants and not also the worshipers of idoles: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worship then to serve. And yet while they seek a hole to hide them in the Greek word, they childishly disagree with themselves. For seeing Latreia in Greek signifies nothing but to worship, their saying commeth but to this effect, as if they would say, that they worship in deed their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seek to catch them in words: but they themselves, while they seek to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, doe bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be neuer so eloquent, they shall not attaine by their eloquence to prove vnto vs that one self-same thing is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shew me a difference in the thing it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape guiltinesse of his fault, by giving his finne a new defiled name: so it is a very absurdity to thinke that these men be quit by new devise of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whom they themselves are compelled to condemn. But so far are they from proving that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountain of all this whole mischief is an vnorderly counterfeiting, wherein they have fruited with them, while both with their owne wit they devise, and with their owne hands they frame them signifying forms to express them a fashion of God.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffered at all. But so farre much as caruing and painting are the gifts of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vfed. Left the things which God hath given for his glorie and for our owne benefit, be not onely defiled by disorderly abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. We thinke it vnlawfull to hate God fashioned out in visible forms, because himself hath forbidden it, and because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glorie. And lest they thinke that it is onely we that are in this opinion, they that have bene travell'd in their works, shall finde that all found writers did alwaye reprove the same thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lees shall it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that onely those things be painted and grauen whereof our eies are capable: but that the maestie of God which is farre above the sense of our eies, be not abused with vncomely defiled shapes. Of this sort are partly hystories and things done, partly images and fashions of bodies, without expressing of any things done by them. The first of these haue some use in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profite the second can bring true onely depletion, I see not. And yet it is euident, that even such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stand vp in churches. Whereby we may judge that they were there set vp not by discreet judgement or choice, but by foolish and vnadvised desire. I speake not howe much amiss and vncomely they were for the most part fashioned, nor how licentious Painteres and Carvers haue in this point flawed their warrantee, which thing I haue already touched. Onely I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet doe they nothing auaille to teach.

13 But leaving all that difference, let vs by the way consider whether it be expedient in Christian temples to have any images at all, that doe express either things done by the bodies of men. First, if the authoritie of the ancient Church doe any thing thing mooue vs, let vs remember that for about five hundred yeeres together, while religion yet better flourished, and sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian Churches were vniueraly without images. So they were then first brought in for the garnishment of churches, when the sincerity of ministration was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them that were the first authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swarved from that vprightnes of them that were without images. What? do we think that those holy fathers would have suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they judged profitable and good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, & much danger to lurk vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose & aduisedly reiect it, then by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in expresse words testify: When they be set in such places (saith he) honorably on hie, to be scene of them that pray and doe sacriuice, although they want both sense and life, yet with the very likenes that they have of liuely members and senses, they do moue the weake minds, that they seeme to live & breath, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doth worke and in maner enforce thus much, that the mind living within a body doth thinke that body to have sense, which he feeleth vnto his owne. And a little after: Images do more auide to bow downe an vnhappy soule, by this that they have mouth, eyes, ears, & feete, than to amend it by this that they neither speake, nor see, nor heare, nor go. This truly seemeth to be the cause why John willed vs to beware not onely of worshipping of images, but also of images themselves. And we have found it too much in experience, that through the horrible madness which hath heretofore possess'd the world, to the destruction, in manner of all godlines, so soone as images be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatry, because the folly of men cannot refraine it selues, but it must forthwith run on to superstitious worshipping. But if there were not so much danger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vs temples are orderd, me thinks it is very ill becomeng the holines thereof, to receive any other images than the liuely and natural images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrated. I meane Baptisme and the Lords supper, and other ceremonies where with our eies ought both more earnestly to be occupied and more liuely to be moued, than that they should neede any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo this is the incomparable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompenced, if we beleue the Papists.

14. I think I had spoken enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speake more. I meane not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holde eight hundred yeeres ago, by the commandement & authoritie of Irene the empress. For that Synode decreed, that images should not onely be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoever I should say, the authoritie of the Synode would make a great prejudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much move mee, as make it appeare to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images then became Christians. But first let vs dispatch this. They that at this day maintaine the se of images, alledge the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defence. But there is extant a booke of confusion bearing the name of Charlesto the Great, which by the phrase we may gather to have bene written at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the Bishops that were present at that Counsell, and the arguments where with they contended. John the Legate of the East partes side: God created man after his owne image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to have images. The same man thought that images were commended vs in this sentence: Show mee thy face because it is beautiful. Another to pronounce that images ought to be set vpon altars, cited this testimonie: no man lighteth a candle and putteth it vnder a bushell. Another to shew that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought forth a verse out of the Psalm: the light of thy countenance is sealed upon vs. Another tooke this similitude: As the Patriarchs vfed the Sacrifices of the Genutes, so must Christian men haue the images of Saints in stead of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose haue they writhed this saying: Lord, I haue lound the beautie of thy house. But specially wittie is the exposition of this place: As we haue heard so haue we seene, that God is not known by onely hearing of his word, but also by looking vpon images. Like is the sharpe dews of Bishop Theodore. Marvellous (faith he) is God in his Saints. And in another place: In the Saints that are in the earth therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, so litle are their favoure sollies that it greeveth me to rehearse them.

15 When they talke of the worshipping: then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharaoh, and of the rod of Joseph, and of the piller that Jacob set vp. Albeit in this last example, they do not onely deprave the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seeme to them maruellous strong and meete prooues. Worrhip his footstool. Againe, worshipping on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in former put the personage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, could he gather together greatere and grosser sollies? But to put all out of doubt, Theodosius Bishop of Mirra, doth so earnestly confirme by the dreams of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heaven to shew for it. Now let the favourers of images go and presse vs with the decree of that Synode. As though those reverend fathers doe not altogether differet themselues, in either so childishly handling, or so vngraciously and lowly tearing the Scriptures.

16 Now come to those monstrous impieties, which it is maruell that euer they durft vomit, and twice marvellous that they were not cried out against with the detestation of all men. And it is good that this outrageous wicked madness be bewraied, that at least the false colour of antiquitie may be taken away, which the Papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Amorium pronounceth curse against all them that will not haue images worshipped. Another imputeth all the calamities of Greece and the East part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophets, the Apostles and Martyrs woorthie to suffer in whose time there were no images? They adde further. If the Emperors image be met with perfume and censing: much more is this honour due to the images of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Cyprus, professeth that he reverently imbraceth images, and affirmeth that he will giue to them the same honourable manner of worship that is due to the Trinitie that giveth life. And whereas he refuseth so to doe, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And that ye should not thinke that this was the private sentence of one man, they did all affent vnto it. Yea John the Legate of the East partes being further carried with heate, saide it were better to bring all brothell house into the citie, then to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all heretikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemn farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and rejoice that hauing the image of Christ do offer sacrifice vnto it. Where is now the distinction of Latria and Dulia, wherewith they are woont to secke to blinde the eies both of God and men? For the counsell without any exception doth giue euen as much vnto images as vnto the living God himself.

That God is severally disserned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

We
We say in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shall be in other places more largely set forth. Now I doe but shortly repeat, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striueth not for the bare name of God, but withall commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the godhead, be not given to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doth differ from superstition. Eusebeia, in Greeke signifies as much as true worship, because alway even the blind themselves gropeing in darkenesse have found that this rule ought to be helden, that God be not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly and well deriveth from relegere, to record, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he alligneth enforced and farre set, that good worshippers did often recorde and diligently way what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a contrarie to wandering libertie, because the greater part of the world vnadvisedly taketh holde of that which they first meeete withall, and flieeth about hither and thither: but true godliness, to the ende it may stand in stedfast state, Relegit, that is to say, doth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Like as I thinke superstition to haue her name hereof, that not being contented, with the manner and order prescrib'd, the heapeeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leaue the words, it hath alway been agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errores corrupted and perverted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, when with vndiscreeete zealke they gie themselues leaue to do all things. And although this confusion found in the mouthes of all men: yet herein a shameful ignorance bewrayeth it selfe, that neither they cleaue to the one God, nor haue any regardes of order in the worshipping of him, as we haue already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is jealous, and that he will be a seuerer reuenger if he be mingled with any faine god. And then he setteth forth the lawfull manner of worshipping, to holde mankinde in obedience. He contenmeth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he onely may be their lawmakere: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses and ends thereof are manie, I will intreate in place fit for it. Now I onely touch this point, that thereby men are bridged that they run not out of the way to wrong worshipping. Now, as I first said, we must hold in minde, that if all that ever properly belongeth to Godhead doth not rest in God alone, he is spoile of his honour, and his worshipping broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what suttleties superstition deceiueth. For it doth not so reuolt vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forsake the higheste God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but whilst the granteth vnto him the higheste place, the setteth round about him a number of lesser gods, among whom he diuideth his offices. And so (albeit clokedly and craftily) the glorie of the Godhead is cut in pieces, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the olde time, as well they of the Jewses as of the Gentiles did set beneath the father and judge of gods a great route of gods which should every one according to his degree in common haste with the higheste God the gouernour of the heauen and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduancfed to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vpon, and honored in head of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the majestie of God is not so much as diuided, when in deed it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, sauing that we retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme powre: and in the meanes heeleeved with entangled suttleties, we are fundely carried to divers gods.

For this purpose also was inuented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme

Cap. 12.

The distinction which Papists make between the honor they do unto God and unto Saints, a turfe and fond.

terne them, that is worship and service, whereby they might freely seeme to give away the honors of God to Angels and dead men. For it is evident, that the worship which the Papists giue vnto Saints, differeth nothing in deede from the worship of God. For all alike without diereticke they worship both God and them: sauing that when they be charged with it, they winde away with this exception, that they keepe still for God the honour that is due vnto him in olate, because they leave vnto him the worship that they call Latria. But fith the question standeth upon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them so carelesly to mock in a matter of all matters most weightie? But to let that also passe, yet win they nothing by this distinction, but to produce, that they giue worship to one God, and service to another. For Latria in Greeke signifieth as much as in Latein Cultus, and in English worship. Dulia, properly signifieth service, and yet sometime in Scripture this difference is coounded together without diereticke. But grant it be a perpetuall difference, then must we search what both the words may meane. Dulia is service, Latria is worship. Now no man doubteth that to servue, is more than to worship. For many times a man could hardly bee to servue him whom he would not sichte to worship. So is it an unequall dealing, to giue to the Saints that which is the greater, and to leave to God that which is the lesser. But many of the ancient authors haue vfed this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men do perceive it to be not only vnfit, but altogether verie fond?

3. Now leauing note littleeties, let vs wry the matter it selfe. When Paul putteth the Galatians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he saith that they gaue Duliam servue to those that of nature were no gods. Althoughe he name Latriam or worship, is therefor their superstition excusable? He doth notewhilest condemn their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia servue, than if he had expresst the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repulseth the assault of Satan with his buckler, that it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Satan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angell reprooued John, because he fell down on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that John was so mad that he would giue vnto the Angel the honor that was due only to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is vsed with religion was vse by somwhat as pertaining to God; therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glorie of God. We read indeed often, that men have bee honoured: but that was a cuill honour, as I may so call it. But religion hath another rule, which so soone as it is vsed with worshippe, bringeth with it a prophane abse of the honour of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profited in godlinesse, but that hee had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore, when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worship him in the stead of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbidd him to do that which he did. And why so? but because men do never so narrowly put difference betweene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diereticke they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we have one God, we must remember that nothing be it neuer so little must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zacharie when he preacheth of the repairing of the church, in plain words expressteth: That there shall not onlie be one God, but also that there shall be one name of that god, to the end that he haue nothing in common with idols, What manner of worship God requireth, we shall see in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his lawe to prescrib men what is lawfull and right, and so to bind them to a certaine rule, that euery man should not giue himselfe leane to devise what forme of worship he list. But because it is not expedient to loade the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touch that point yet.

That which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spiritual essence of God, ought to suffice not only to overthrow the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtleties of prophane Philosopher. One of the old writers seemed to have said very well, That God is all that we do see, and all that we do not see. But by this mean he hath imagined the Godhead to be power'd into all the parts of the world. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparingly of his own essence; yet by those two names of addition that I have rehearsed, he doth both take away all groffe imaginations, and also refpeffe the presumptuous boldnes of mans minde. For surely his immeasurable greatness ought to make vs afraid, that we attempt not to measure him with our fenes: and his spiritual nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often affieth his dwelling place to be in heaven. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our minde by reason of their dunneflie to lie still in the earth, for good cause he lifteth vs vp above the worlde, to shake off our floth and sluggishness. And here falleth to ground the errour of the Manichees, which in appointing two originall beginnings, haue made the diuell in a maner equall with God. Surely, this was as much as to breake the vnitie of God and restraine his unmeasurable essence. For where they haue presumed to abuse certain testimonies: that sheweth a foule ignorance, as their errour is freesheth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphites are also easilie confused, which have imagined God to consist of a bodie, because oftentimes the Scripture affieth unto him a mouth, eares, eyes, hands and feete. For what man, yea though he be slenderly witted, doth not understand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childibly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such maner of speeches doth not so plainly expresse what God is, as they do apply the understand ing of him to our slender capacitie. Which to doe, it beconned of necessitie that he descended a great way beneath his owne height.

The Scripture teacheth God to be an essence unmeasurable & spiritual, doth not only shay men from measuring God by sense, and from imagining any earthly thing of him, but also by the one doth confute the Manichees, by the other the Anthropomorphites of madnesse.

2 But he also seeth out himselfe by another speciall markie, whereby he may be more necerly knowne. For he so declareth himselfe to be but one, that he yet gueth himselfe distinctly to be considerd in three persons: which except we learn, a bare and emptie name of God without any true God lieth in our braine. And that no man should think that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is divided in three persons, we must here finde a short and easie definition to deliver vs from all error. But because many do make much ado about this word Person, as a thing invented by man: how insuitly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostle naming the soone the engraued forme of the Hypoffais of his father, he undoubtedly meaneth, that the ffather hath some being wherein he differeth from the soone. For to take it for essence (as some expoundes haue done, as if Christ like a piece of waxe printed with

with a scale did represent the substance of the father) were not only hard but also an absurdity. For if the essence of God is single or one and undivisible, he that in himself contains it all, and not by pecuniary, or by derivation, but in whole perfection, should very vapourly, yea, fondly be called the engraven form of him. But because the father, although he be in his own proper distinct, hath expressed himself wholly in his sonne; it is for good cause said, that he hath given his Hypostasis, to be seen in him. Wherewith aptly agreeeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightness of his glory. Surely by the Apostles words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the father, that shineth in the sonne: whereby also againe is easily perceived the Hypostasis of the sonne that diuinguished him from the Father. And order is in the holy Ghost. For we shall by and by prosecute him to be God, and yet he must needs be other than the father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is unlawful to make manifest. Therefore if the Apostles testimonie be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypostases. This termes seeing the Latines have expressed with the name of Person, it were too much pride and waawardnes to braule about so cleere a matter. But if we lift word for word to translate, we may call it subsistence. Many in the same sense have called it substance. And the name of Person hath not been in use among the Latines onely, but also the Greeks, perhaps to declare a confest, have taught that there are three Hypostases, that is to say Persons in God. But they, whether they be Grecians or Latines that differ one from another in the word, doe very well agree in the summe of the matter.

3 Now howsoever the heretikes barke at the name of Person, or some overmuch precise men doe care that they like not the word found by deuile of men: sith they cannot get of vs to lay, that there be three, whereof every one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many Gods: what unreasonable blenesse is this, to mislike wordes, which express none other thing but that which is testified and approoved by the Scriptures? It were better (lay they) to restraine not only our meanings but also our wordes within the bounds of Scripture, than to deuise strange names that may be the beginnings of disagreement and brawling: so doe we tie our felues with string about words: so the truthe is lost in contending: so charitie is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a strange word, which cannot be thwed in Scripture, as it is written in number of syllables: then they binde vs to a hard law, whereby is condemned all exposition that is not seeced together; with bare laying together of textes of Scripture. But if they meane that to be strange, which being curiously devised, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaptly, or to no profite vs, which withdraweth from the simplicitie of the word of God, then with all my hart I embrace their sober minde. For I judge that we ought with no leaffe deteoute reverence to take of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoeuer we doe of our felues thinke of him, is foolish, and whatsoeuer we speake is vncharitie. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke and speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what withstandeth vs, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacite doubtfull and entangled, we may in plainer wordes express them: being yet such words as doe reverently and faithfully serue the truth of the Scripture, and be vsed sparingly, modestely, and not without occasion? Of which sort there are examples ynow. And whereas it shal by proofe appeare that the Church of great necessitie was enforced to vs the names of Trinitie, and Persones, if any shal then finde fault with the newnesse of words, shal they not be inftly thought to be greeted at the light of the truth, as he that blameth onely this, that the truth is made so plaine and cleere to discern?

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vs, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that do mock it out with caullations.
God the Creator. Lib. 1. 25

tions. Which thing we have at this day too much in experience, who have great betimes in vanquishing the enemies of true and sound doctrine. With such folding and crooked winding these slippery snakes do slide away, unless they be strongly gripped and holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meanings in exquisite plaines, lest they should leave any crooked bywaies to the wicked, to whom the doubstful constructions of words were hiding holes of errors. Arius confessed Christ to be God, and the sonne of God, because he could not gainsay the evident words of God, and as if he had beene so sufficiently discharged, did fame a certaine confent with the rest. But in the meantime while he ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was creat, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtle crepe out of his den, the ancient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternal son of the father & confubstantial with the father.

Heereat wickednes began to boile, when the Ariains began to hate and detest the name Omousion, confubstantiall. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now have denied him to be confubstantiall with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as brutters and contentious, because for one little words sake, they were so hot in disputacion, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that little word shewed the difference betwenee the true believing Christians, and the Ariains that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accounted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, and Holy Ghost, laying in disputacion that they were not made to shew any manner of distinction, but only were suerual additio therefore are many. If he came to disputacion, he confessed, that he beleued the father God, the sonne God, the holy Ghost God. But afterward he would readily flip away with saying, that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, just God, and wise God: and so he sung another song, that the Father is the Son, and the holy Ghost is the Father, without any order, without any distinction. The good doctors which then had care of godlines, to subdue his wickednes, cried out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties: and to the end to fende the foules against the crooked wrioth subtleetes with plaine & simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly subsist in one God, or (which came at one effect) that there did subsist in the vitrie of God a Trininity of persons.

5 If then the names have not beene without cause inuended, we ought to take heed, that in reieging them we be not unjustly blamed of proud presumptuousnes. I would to God they were buried indeed, so that this faith were agreed of all men that the Father and the Sonne, and the holy Ghost be one God: and yet that the Fa	her is not the Sonne, nor the holy Ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine proper tie. Yet am I nor so precie, that I can finde in my hart to utile for bare words. For I note, that the olde fathers, which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not euere where agree one with another, nor euery one with himself. For what forms of speech vyed by the Counsell doth Hilary excus? To how great libertine doeth Augustine sometime break forth? How unlike are the Grekes to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time: When the Latins ment to express the word Omousion, they called it Confubstantiall, declaring the substance of the Father & the Son to be one, & vltying the word substance for essence.
Whereupon Hierome to Damosius sayeth, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substancesses in God: and yet about a hundred times you shall finde in Hilary, that there are three substances in God. In the word Hypostases, how is Hierome accompamed? For he specketh that there lurketh poyon in naming three Hypostases in God.
And if a man do ye this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly faith that it is an im proper speech, if he speake vnfaine, and did not rather withingly & willingly seeke the effence is nothing else but hypostasis, which is pronounced false by the common and accustomed vfe. Augustine is more moderate and gentle, which although he say, that the word hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latine eares, yet so far is it off, that he taketh from the Greeks their vulgar manner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Greek phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the first booke of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this ende, as though he meant that he had by vnskilful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the fame Hillarie himselfe laeth it for a great faulte to the heretikes charge, that by their waiwardnes he is compelled, to put those things in peril of the speech of men, which ought to haue bin kept in religiousnes of minds, plainly confessing that this is to do things vnlawfull, to speake that ought not to be spoken, to attempt things not licenced. A little after, he excusat himselfe with many words, for that he was so bolde to vter newe names. For after he had vfed the natureall names Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, hee addeth whatsoever he sought further, is beyond the compasse of speech, beyond the reach of sense, and beyond the capacitie of vnderstanding. And in another place he faith, that happie are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had not receitned, nor knewe any other confession, but that olde and simple one, which from the time of the Apostles was receitned in all Churches.

And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrung out of necessitie by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to express that which is, but that it should not be vnsoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost are three. This modelifie of the holy men ought to Warner vs, that wee doe not forthevthwith so feuerely, like Cenfor, note them with infamie that refuse to subscribe and swear to such wordeas vse propounde them: so that they doe it not of pride, of browardnes, or of malicious craft. But let them againe confider, by how great necessitie we are driven to speake so, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable manner of speech. Let them also leerne to beware, left sith we must meete on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to caull, they bring themselves in suspition, that they be the discipules either of Arrius or of Sabellius.
Arrius faith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was created, and had a beginning. He faith Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the cares of his discipules, that he was made one as the other faithfull be, although by singular prerogative. Say once that Christ is Confubstantiall with his Father, then plucke you off his visirour from the dissembler, and yet you adde nothing to the scripture.
Sabellius faith, that the feuerall names, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, significa nothing in God generallly distinct: say that they are three: and he will eie out that you name three gods. Say that there is in one effence a Trinitie of persons, then shall you in one word both say what the Scripture speaketh, and stop their vaine babbling.
Now if any be holde with so curious superstition, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would never so faie, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must vnderstand an unitie of substance: when we heare of three in one effence, that is ment of the persons of the trinitie. Which thing being without fraud confesed, we may no longer upon words. But I have long ago founde, and that often, that who so our do obstatuine quarell about words, do keepe within them a secret poifeon: so that it is better willingly to provoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkly.

The effence of God is one simple and single thing, wherein there are
6. But leaving disputac of wordees, I will now began to speake of the matter it selue. I cal therefore a Person, a substance in the effence of God, which having relation to the other is distinguished from them with uncommunicable propertie. By the name of the subsistence we mean another thing than the essence. For if the word had simply been God, and in the mean time had nothing peculiar to it selfe, John had said amiss that it was with God. Where he saith, that God himselfe was the same word, he calleth vs backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not be with God, but that it must rest in the father; hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be joined to the essence with an unseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall mark, where by it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistences, I say, that each having relation to other, is in propertie distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth not to the Sonne and the Holy ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the peculiar property of either doth differne him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper unto every of them is uncommunicable. For that which is given to the Father for a mark of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Sonne. And I dislike not the definition of Tertullian, that it is rightly taken, That there is in God a certain disposition or distributio, which yet changeth nothing of the unity of the essence.

7 But before that I goe any further, it is good that I prove the Godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from another. Surely when the word of God is spoken in the Scripture: it were a vertic great absurdity to imagine it onely a fading and vanishing voice, which sent into the aire, commeth out of God him selfe, of which sort were the oracles given to the fathers, and all the prophesies: when rather the word is mete to be the perpetuall wisdom abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no lesse did the old prophets speake with the spirit of Christ, than did the Apollines and all they that after them did distribute the heavenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must understand that the Word was before all worlds begotten of the Father. And if the Spiritue was of the word, whose instruments were the Prophets, we doe undoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he seteth the word as the meane. Why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating of all his works saith, Be this done: or that done: but that the unsearchable glory of God may shinny appeare in his images? The subtle-nofed and babbling men do easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Word, is there taken for his bidding or commandement. But better expositors are the Apollines, which teach that the worlds were made by the same, and that he sufficeth them all with his mightie word. For here we see that the word is taken for the bidding or commandement of the Son, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiel Word to the Father. And to the wise and sober it is not darke that Salmon faith, where he bringeth in wise dome begotten of God before all worlds, and bearing rule in the creation of things, and in all the works of God. For to say that it was a certaine commandement of God, terning but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: whereas indeed it was Gods pleasure at that time to shew forth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and something more secret. To which intent also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I do work even to this day. For in saying: That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then that the meaning of Gods speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, and so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth John speake, when he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all things. For he both giueth to the Word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth unto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainly sheweth how god in speaking was the creator of the world. Therefore as all relations proceeding proceeding from God doe well bære the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the highest place that substantial word, the wellspring of all oracles, which being subject to no alteration, abideth always one and the same name with God, and is God himself.

8 Here many dogges doe bare against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steal from him his eternity. For they say, that the Word then began first to be, when God in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But very vndiscreetly doe they to imagine a certaine innovation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that have relation to his outward works, began to be given unto him after the beginning of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heaven and earth: doth God in his being, know or admit no name that should signify any new thing in himselfe to have chanched unto God. For if any should come to him from else where than in himselfe, then this saying of James should fail, that every good givings and every perfect gift, is from above, and commeth downe from the Father of lightes, with whom is no variablenesse, neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is left to be suffered, than to faine a beginning of that Word, which both always was God, and afterwards was Creator of the World. But full suteable forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth suteably shew, that there was no word in him before. Which is a most truing argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had never any being before. But I conclude farrer otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God said, Let light be made, the power of the worde appeared and shewed itself: the same Word was long before: but if a man ask how long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe said: Father, glorifie me with the glory which I had with thee before the World was. And this thing John also left not untouched, because he first shewed that in the beginning the Word was with God, before that he commeth to the creation of the world. We say therefore againe, that the Word which was conceived of God before any beginning of time, was continually remanning with him. Whereby both his eternity, true essence, and Godhead is proved.

9 Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but doe defer it to that place where we shall specially entreat of the redemption: yet because it ought to be certainly helden without controversy among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place will be very fit to recite all those testimonies that prove Christ to be God. When it is said in the xlv. Psalme, thy throne O God is for ever and ever: the Iewes doe caull and say, that the name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and soueraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raffeth an eternal throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternal Lord. Again, this title is gien to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shal be for a God to Pharaoh. Some read it in the Geniture case which is very foolish. I grant indeede that often times a thing is called Divine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not so yeeld: in Esaiie is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the soueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (faith he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the World to come, &c. Here the Iewes bare against, and turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the world to come shall call him: so that they leave this only to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose should to many names of addition in this place be heaped vp to God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorne Christ Christ with such special notes as may build our faith upon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like force called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer than that place of Hieremys where he saith, that this shall be the name whereby the seed of David shall be called Jehovah our righteoufness. For where the Jews themselves do teach, that all other names of God are but adietute names of addition, and that this only name Jehovah which they call unspeakable is a substantive name to express his essence: we gather that the Son is the only and eternall God, which faith in another place that he will not give his glorie to another. But here also they seek to scape away because that Moses gave that name to the Altar that hee builded: and Ezekiel gave it to the newe citie Hierusalem. But who doeth not see that the Altar was built for a monument that God was the avancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but only to testifie the presence of God? For thus the Prophet: The name of the cite from that day shall be Jehovah there. And Moses faith thus: He builded an Altar and called the name of it, Jehovah my exaltation. But more bufines ariseth by another place of Hieremys, where the same title is applied to Hierusalem in these words: this is the name whereby they shall call her Jehovah our righteousness. But this testimonie is so farre from making against the truth which wee defend, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Jehovah from whom floweth righteousness, nowe he pronounceth that the Church shall so verily feel the same, that the most gloriously vs the verie name itself. And so in the first place is set the fountain and cause of righteousness in the other the effect.

10 Now if this do not satisfie the Jews, that Jehovah is so often presented in the person of an Angell, I see not with what caullations they can mocke it out. It is said, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell challengeth to himselfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and say, that this is spoken in respect of the person that he representeth: this knot is not thus loosed. For being a servant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offerd to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate bread, commandeth Sacrifice to be offered to Jehovah. And then he pronounceth that himselfe indeed was the same Jehovah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not onely an Angell but God. And thence came it that hee said we shal die because we haue seene God. And when his wife answrith, if Jehovah would haue flaine vs, hee would not haue receyved Sacrifice at our hands: in this the doth confesse that hee was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the answere of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why dost thou ask me of my name, which is maruellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Serueto, when he affirmed that God never appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshippd in place of him. But truly and wisely haue the true teaching doctours of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the Word of God, which then as aforhands began to execute the office of mediatour. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a means betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the same time he retained that which was his owne, to be the God of unspeakable glorie. The same thing meaneth Osea, which after he had receiued the wraelling of Jacob with the Angell, faith: Jehovah the God of hosts, Jehovah, worthie of memorie is his name. Here againe Serueto carpeth, that God did bare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not conforme that which Moses had said: why doest thou ask me of my name? And the confession of the Holy Patriarch dode sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whom whom the full Godhead was resident, when he saide: I have seen God face to face. And for this cause Paul faith, that Christ was guide of the people in the wilderness. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternal word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharias be wayed without contention, the Angel that sent another Angel was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omit innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they do not much moone the Jews. For when it is said in Esay: Behold, this is our God, this is the Lord, we shall wait upon him, & he shall save us, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is ment God which raiseth vp for the salvation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twice repeatediffer it to be drawn to other where but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachi, where he promiseth that he shall come, the Lord that was then defired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only soueraigne God was the temple dedicate, whereupon yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the same God, that was once honored among the Jews.

As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefo we must trauell rather thortly to choose out five, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediatour in flesh; yet all that I shall bring foorth shall aptly serve to proue his Godhead. First, this is worthie to be singulary marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles do shew that they are either alreadie performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esay prophesiceth that the Lord of hostes shall be to the Jews and Israelites a stumblingstone & a rocke to fall upon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in another place, We must all (faith hee) once be brought to appeare before the judgment throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all tongues sweare, Seeing God in Esay speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deed performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe same God, whose glory may not be withdrawn to another. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeareth out of the Pfalms, is evident that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Attending on he hath carriied caputiae capitio, meaning that such ascending was in shadow shewed, when God in notable victory against foreine nations did shew foorth his power, but he declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So John testifieth that it was the glorie of the Son that was reveiled to Esay by a vifion, whereas in deede the Prophet himselfe wrote that the majesty of God appeared vnto him. And it is evident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrews applyeth to the Sonne, are the plain titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst laie the foundations of heaven and earth, &c. Again, worship him all yee his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Pfalms, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercie of Sion. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kingsdome of all the nations and islands. And why should John sticke to apply the majesty of God to Christ, which in his perface had said that the worde was alwaye God? Why should Paul seare to say Christ in the judgement throne of God, having beforewith so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he said that he was God blest to the ende of worlds? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be praised to the end of worldes, then he is the same to whom in another place he affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but playnly cryeth out, that he would have counted it no robberie, if he had shewed himselfe equall equall with God, but that he willingly abased himself. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, John goeth further and faith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought abundantly to satisfy vs, that he is called God, specially of that witness which expressly affirmeth vs, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witness is Paul, which faith thus: How many souer can be called Gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all things. When we heare of the fame mouth, that God was openlie shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne bloud purchased the church vs unto himselfe: why should we imagine a second God which he himselfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the fame meaning. Likewise Thomas in professing him to be his Lord and his God, doth profess that he is that onely God whom he had alwaies worshipped.

12. Now if we entertaine his Godhead by the worke in that the Scripture are ascrib'd vs unto him, it shall thereby more evidently appeare. For when he said that from the beginning he was thither to working with his Father: the Jews which were most skilfull in understanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceived that he tooke upon him the power of God. And therefore as John telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not onely breake the Sabbath, but also did call God his Father, making himselfe equall with God. How dull shall we be then, if we do not perceive that his Godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truly to order the world with prudence and power, and to governe all things with the authority of his owne might, which the Apostle ascribeth vs unto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteth the governement of the world with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that do away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Jews thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgive sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in worde, but also prooved by miracle that this power belonged unto himself. We see therefore that he lieth, not the ministration, but the power of forgiveness of sinnes, which the Lord faith he will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shall we say of searching, and pearling the secret thoughts of harts? is it not the propertie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

13. Now in his miracles how plainly and clearly doth he appeare? And though I grant that as well the Prophets as the Apostles did equal and like miracles to thefe that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministration disposed the gifts of God, he shewed forth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the end to give glory vs unto his Father. But we see for the most parte his owne power shewed vs. And how could it otherwise be but that he was the very authour of miracles that by his owne authoritie gave power to other to dale miracles abroad? For the Evangelist declareth that he gave power to the Apostles to raise vp the dead, to heale the leproous, to cast out deuils. &c. And they so vsed the ministration thereof, that they sufficiently shewed that this power came not from cl's where but from Christ. In the name of Iesus Christ (faith Peter) rise and walke. It is therefore no marueile if Christ allledged his miracles to confound the vnbelieuings of the Jews: forasmuch as they were such as being done by his owne power did give a most plaine testimonic of his Godhead. If else where then in God there is no sustaution, no righteousses, no life: and Christ containeth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can obiect against me and say, that life and sustaution is poureth into him by God: for it is not sayd that he received sustaution, but that he is sustaution himselfe. And if none be good but onely God: how can he be onely man, being I will not say good and just, but selfe goodness

His working with the Father, by the governernge of the world, by pardoning of sinnes, by perswading the very thoughtes of the harts, poureth him to be very God. John 5. 17.

That he wrought miracles by his owne power, and gave power vs to others to work: that he is author of life and sustaution: that he is goodness & justice & felicity, that men are willing to beleeue and trust in him, that he name is called upon, that we are taught to glory in the knowledge of him, that the same things are失信ly from the father and from him, these are proofs of his Godhead.

and justice? Yea, from the first beginning of the creation as the Evangelist witnesseth, in him was life: and he even then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being supported with such promises we are bold to repose our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an ungodliness that robbeth God for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God? faith he. Beleeue then also in me. And so doth Paul expound those two places of Esay, Whofoever trusteth in him, shall not be put to shame. Againe, Out of the roote of Jaffy shall he come that shall rise to rule peoples, in him the nations shall trust. And why should we seeke out more testimonies of Scripture for this matter, when we so often meete with this sentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternall life. Moreover the invocation which lingeth vpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the majestie of God, if he have anything at all proper to himselfe. For one Prophet sayeth: Whofoever calleth vpon the name of Iebouah shall be saued: and another sayeth, a most strong tourre is the name of Iebouah: to it the righteous shall flee and he shall be saued, but the name of Christ is called vpon for salvation: it followeth therefore that he is Iebouah. As for Invocation, we have an example of it in Stephen, when he sayeth, Lord Ieffu receive my spirit. Againe, in the whole Church, as Ananias testifieth in the same booke, Lord (sayeth he) thou knowest how great euils this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly vnderstanded, that the whole fulneffe of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doth confesse that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs, whom he willeth to glory in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare say, that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Befide that, the salutations set before the Epiftles of Paul, with the same benedictes from the Sonne which they doe from the Father: whereby we are taught not onely that those things which the Father giueth vs doe come vnto vs by his intercession, but also by communite of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practise is without doubt more certaine and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the godly minde doth behould God most present, and in manner handle him, where it feeueth it selfe to be quickened, lightned, saued, justified and sanctified.

14. Wherefore out of the same fountains we must fetch our meane of prouing to conforme the Godhead of the Holy Ghost. Very plaine is the testimony of Moses in the history of the creation, that the spirite of God was upon the depths, or vpon the unfashioned heape: because he sheweth that not onely the beautie of the world that is now to be scene is preserved by the power of the Spirite, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirite was then builed in preserving that confused lump of things. And that saying of Esay cannot be cauled against, And now Iebouah and his Spirite hath sent me. For he communicateth with the Holy ghost his chief power in sending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the divine majestie of the Holy Ghost. But our best proofe, as I have said, shall be by familiar vfe. For that which the Scriptures impuote vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and such a thing as we our selues doe learne by affered experience of godliness. For he it is that being eche where poured abroad, doth sustaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heaven and in earth. And by this point he is proued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his luely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the very workes of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorrupitable life be better and more excellent than any present quickening: what shall we judge of him from whose power the same proceeded? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth, and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the sonne, fo vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For he teacheth the depe secrets of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsel. He giveth wisdom and skil to speake, whereas yet the Lorde pronounced to Moses that it is onely his worke to doe it. So by him wee come to a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our justification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing focuer may be thought of, because it is the holy Ghost onely from whom proceeded all kind of gifts. For that sentence of Paul is right woorthie to be noted. Although there be divers gifts, and manifold sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirit: because he maketh him not onely the originall or beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these words. One and the same Spirit distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute vnto him choice of minde and will. Therefore most evidently doth Paul give to the holy Ghost divine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that we are the temple of God, because his spirit dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed over. For whereas God oftentimes proomiseth that he will choose vs for a temple to himselfe, that promise is now no other way fulfilled, but by his spirit dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustine very well faith: if we were commanded to make vnto the holy Ghost a temple of timber and stone because such worship is due to God onely, it were a cleere argument that he is God: now therefore how much cleerer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our selves to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himself calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the holy Ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to the holy Ghost, saide that he lied not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lorde of hosts speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the holy Ghost that speakeh. Yea, where commonly the Prophets faie, that the words which they utte are the words of the Lord of hosts, Christ and the Apostles do referre them to the holy Ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Jehovah, that is, the chief author of prophecies. Again, where God complaineth that he was provoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people, in stead of that Esay faith that his Holie Spirit was grieved. Last of all, if blasphemy against the holy Ghost be not forguen in this worlde nor in the worlde to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his divine majestie is here plainly proseued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an unpardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the ancient writers haue vfed. They haue thought it a maruellous meete place to alleage out of David: with the word of the Lord the heauens were establisshed, and all the power of them with the spirit of his mouth, to proseue that the world was no lesse the worke of the holy Ghost than of the Sonne. But forasmuch as it is commonly vfed in the Psalms to repeate one thing twice: and in Esay, the spirit of his mouth is as much to say as his word, that reason is very weake. Therefore I thought good to touch a fewe such things as godly minde might soundly rest upon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclaied himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly knowne. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby prooueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore.

The holy Ghost in Scripture plainly termed God.

In the Trinitie of persons the unio of God is prooued by this that there is but one faith & one Baptisme. Ep.4.5.

Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme we must needs thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised: And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemn protestation, Christ meant to testify that the perfect light of Faith was alreadie delivoured, when he said Baptize them in the name of the Father & of the Son and of the holy Ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightness hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost. Whereby is evident that in the essence of God abide three Persones in which the one God is known. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diversely to wander about, but to have regard to the one God, to be applied to him, and to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily prooved, that if there bee divers kindes of Faith, there must also be many Gods. Now whereas Baptisme is a Sacrament of Faith: it proveth unto vs the unity of God, because it is but one. And heereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, because we embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What mean Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to beleue in the Father, Sonne, and the holy Ghost? Therefore lieth this remaineth certaine, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Word and the Spirit are nothing else but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arrians prate, which confessting the godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would have to be underlaidd by the Spirit, onely the gifts of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisedome, understanding, prudence, fortitude, fear of God do proceede from him: so he onely is the spirite of wisedome, prudence, fortitude, and godlineffe. Yet is not he deuided according to the distribution of his graces: but howsoever they be diversely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle faith.

17 Again, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirit. In discoursing whereof, howe great religiousnes and sobrieties we ought to use, the greatness of the mystery it selfe doth admonish vs. And I verie well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzen: I cannot thinke upon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightness of the three: And I cannot severellly demerke the three, but I am suddenly drawn backe to one. Wherefore let us not come in our minde ons to imagine such a Trinitie of Persones as may holde our thought withdrawn into seueralitie, and doth not forthwith bring vs againe to that vertue. The names of Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, do procure a true distinction, that no man should thinke then to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diversely entitled: but yet it is a distinction, not a diuersion. The places that we have alreadie cited, doe shewe that the Sonne hath a properitie distinct from the Father, because the Worde had not beene with God, if he had not been another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glorie with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he faith, that there is another which bear eth him witness. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Worde, which he could not, but being after a certaine manner distinct from him. Moreover, the Father came not downe into the eart, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not, nor rose again, but he that was fent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh, but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the boosome of the Father, For who can abide to saie, that then the Sonne entred into the boosome of the Father, when he descended from heavne to take manhood epus him? He was therefore before in the boosome of the Father, and enjoyed his glorie with the Father. As for the the distinction of the Holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceeded from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be another beside himself? as when he promiseth that he will send another comforter, and often in other places.

18 But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to express the force of this distinction, I know no other whether it be expedient. In deed the old fathers are wont to do sometimes: but with all they doe confess, that whatsoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afeid to be any way bold, least if I bring foorth any thing vaingloriously, it should give occasion either to the malicious to cauall, or to the unskillfull to be deceived. Yet such distinction as we have marked to be set out in Scriptures, is not good to have left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is given the beginning of working, the fountain and spring of all things: to the Sonne, wisdom, counsel, and the very disposition in the doing of things: to the holy Ghost it is assigned power and effectual working. And although eternity belong unto the Father, and eternity to the Sonne and to the Holy Ghost also, for as much as God could never have beene without his wisdom and power, and in eternity is not to be fought, which was first or last: yet this observation of order is not vain or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckoned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the holy Ghost. For every man's minde of it selues enlineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisdom rising out of him, and last of all the power whereby he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort the Sonne is said to be of the Father onely, and the holy Ghost both of the Father & the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viij. Chapter to the Romane, where the same Spirit is without difference sometime called the Spirit of Christ, and sometime of him that raiseth vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testify, that it was the Spirit of Christ wherewith the Prophets did prophesie, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

19 Now this distinction is so far off from standing against the single unitie of God, that thereby we may prooue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one Spirit with him, and that the holy Spirit is not a thing duers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypostasis is vnderstanded the whole substance, with this, that every one hath his owne properie. The Father is whole in the Sonne, and the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmit. I am in the Father, and the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiastical writers do not grant the one to be severd from the other by any difference of essence. By these names that betoken distinction (faith Augustaine) that is meant whereby they have relation one to another, and not the very substance whereby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, & sometime that the Sonne hath both Godhead & essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this dutesitie Augustine doth in another place vell and plainly declare, when he saith: Christ having respect to himselfe, is called God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where having respect to the Son he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: and where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: and where he is called as to himselfe the Father, and as to himselfe the Sonne it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne: without having respect to the Father, we do well & properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation between him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinitie doth nothing but...

but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too subtly piercing into the true mysteries, to wander abroad by many vain speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with soberneffe, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learn so much as is profitable to be known: that is, when we professe that we beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, we understand the one only and single essence in which we comprehend three Persons or Hypoostases. And therefore so oft as we doe indefinitely speake of the name of God, we mean no leffe the Sonne and the holy Ghoft than the Father. But when the Sonne is joyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction between the Persons. And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them, so as the beginning and original is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the holy Ghoft together, the name of God is peculiarly given to the Father. By this meanes is retained the notion of the essence, and regarde is had to the order, which yet doth minim nothing of the godhead of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoft. And whereas we have already seen that the Apostles doe affirm, that the Sonne of God is he, whom Moses and the Prophets doe testify to be Jehovah the Lord, we must of necessiteit alway come to the notion of the essence. Wherefore it is a delectable knowledge for vs to call the Sonne a several God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himselfe cannot be faide to be this or that. Nowe, that the name of Jehovah the Lorde indefinitely taken is applied to Christ, appeareth by the wordes of Paul, where he faith: Therefore I haue thirfe prayed the Lord, because that after he had received the answer of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he faith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certaine that the name Lorde is there set for Jehovah, and therefore to restaine it to the person of the Mediatour were very fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that cometh not in the Father with the Sonne. And wee knowe that after the accustomed manner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly set the word Kyrios, Lord, in stead of Jehovah, And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sentence pray to the Lorde, than in the same sentence that Peter cite the place of Joel: Whoseoeuer calleth upon the name of the Lorde shall be saved. But where this name is peculiarly given to the Sonne, we shall see that there is another reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is ynoough to haue in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Even so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Ghoft. For there is no caue agaynst it, but that the whole essence of God may be spiritual, wherein the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghoft be comprehended. Which is very plain by the Scripture. For euem as there we hear God to be made a Ghoft: so we doe hear the Holy Ghoft, for so much as it is an Hypoostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Satan, to the end to root out our Faith, hath alwayis mowed great contentions, partly concerning the divine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghoft, and partly concerning their distinction of Persons: And as in a manner in all ages he hath stirr'd vp wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he travaileth out of the olde eniemes to kindle a newe fire; therefore here it is good to answere the perverse foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath bene our purpose, to lead as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to strue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we have alreadie peaceably shewd, must be restitued from the caullations of the wicked: Albeit my chiefe trauell shall yet be applied to this end, that they which give gentle and open care to the word of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to leaf their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secret mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heed that neither our thought nor our tongue proceede any farther than the bounds of God's worde doe extende. For how may the minde of man by his capacitie define the immeasurable essence of God, which never yet could certainly determine howe great is the bodye of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea, how may the by her owne guiding attaine to discouer the substance of God, that cannot reach to knowe her owne substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarius faith, is a convenient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knowne but by himselfe. We shall giue it ouer vnto him, if we shall both conceive him to be such as he hath opened himselfe vnto vs, and shall not else where search to know of him, than by his owne word. There are to this end written fine homilies of Chrysostome against the Anomie. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrained by them from babbling unbridledly. For they haue behaued themselves in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the unhappie success of which vnreuerence, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selerues to travell in this question rather with trauable willingnesse to leaue, than with sharpnesse of wit, and never haue in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same worde. The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoft, as it is very harde to knowe, so doth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wits than is expedient. Let them remem ber that the mindes of men doe enter into a maze when they follow their owne curiositie, and so let them suffer themselves to be ruled with the heavenly oracles, how soever they cannot attaine the height of the mysterie.

22 To make a register of the errors, wherewith the purenesse of Faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past been afflicted, were too long and full of vnprofitable tediousnesse, and the most part of heretikes have so attempted to ouerwhelme the glorie of God with groffe doting errors, that they have thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vnskilfull. And from a few men haue spung vp many fectes, whereof some doe teare in under the essence of God, some doe confounde the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if we holde faft that which is alreadie sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that the essence of the one God, which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghoft, is single and undivided: Againe, that the Father by a certaine propertye differeth from the Sonne, and the Sonne from the Holy Ghoft: we shall stop vp the gate not only against Arrinus and Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errors. But because in our time there be rifen vp certaine phrentike men, as Seruettio and other like, which have encom bred all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discouer their fallhoods. The name of the Trinitie was so hateful, yea, so detestable to Seruettio, that he faide, that all the Trinitaries, as hee called them, were vterly godlesse. I omit the foolish words that he had deued to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe: That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and that this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeth with the vnitie of God. In the meane time the Persons he would have to be certaine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truly subsisting in the essence of God, but doe reprefent God vnto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing distinct, because once the Word and the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy ghost springe also another god out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he faith, that the eternall Word of God was the spirit of Christ with God, and the bright shining of his form:
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of

For of that forme: againe, that the holy Ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirminf that after the rate of distribution, there is both in the Sonne & in the holy Spirit a part of God, even as the same Spirit in us, and also in wood and stones is substantially a portion of God. What he babbled of the Person of the Mediator, we shall heare after in place convenient. But this monstrous forged deuse, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long consideration. For whereas John pronounced, that the Worde was God before the world was yet created, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, ye, & from farthest Eternitie of time, that Worde which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasue that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the historie of the creation of the world, yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essentiall power of God, when Moses sheweth, that the very unshioned lump was sustained in him. Therefore it then appeareth, that the eternall Spirit was alwayes in God, when he preferred and sustained the confused matter of heaven and earth, untill beauty and order were added unto it, Surely he could not yet be an image or representation of God as Serueto dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednes, in saying that God by his eternall purpose, appointing to himself a visible Sonne, did by this meanes shew himselfe visible. For if that be true, there is no other godhead left vnto Christ, but so farre as he is by the eternall decre of God ordained his Sonne. Moreover, he so transformeth those imagined shapes, that the fchicketh not to faine newe accidents in God, but this of all other is most abominable, that he confusely mingled as well the Sonne of God, as the holy Ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which every portion is God. And namely he faith, that the Spirits of the faithfull are coeternall & consubstantiall with God: albeit in another place he assigneth the substantiall deity, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth another like monster. For certaine lewd men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednes of Serueto, have indeede confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner howe: that the Father which truly and properly is the one only God, informing the Sonne and the holy Ghost, hath powerd his godhead into them. Yea they forbeare not this horrible manner of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, that he is the only efficient or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colour, that Christ is each where called the Sonne of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they mark not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometyme given to the Father onely, because he is the fountain and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpose, to make the fingle vitue of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception and say: If he be truly the Sonne of God, it is inconvenient to have him reckoned the Sonne of a Person. I answer, that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediator) and yet for explicitations sake we oughte to have regard to the Person, that the name of God be not taken simpily but for the Father onely. For if we meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throw downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so ofte as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison between the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly the God that appeard to Esmee was the true and onely God, and yet John affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Esay testified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Jews, was the onely God; and yet Paul pronounceth that the fame was Christ. He that crieth out by Esay, I live, and to me all knees shall bow, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the fame was Christ. For this purpose terme the testimonies that the Apostle reciteth. Thou O God hast laide the foundations of heaven and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worship him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he faith, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this caulation is nothing worrth, that is given to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightness of his glory. For because in each of these places is set the name of Jehovah, it followeth, that it is so faide in respect that he is God of himself. For if he be Jehovah, it cannot be denied that he is the Name God that in another place crieth out by Esay: I, I am, and beside me there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieronimi: The gods that have not made the heaven and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is under the heaven. Whereas on the other side we must needs confesse, that the Sonne of God is he, whose Godhead is oft prooued in Esay by the creation of the world. And how can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borrow his being of another? For whosoeuer faith that the Sonne was effentiat or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy Ghost faith the contrarie, naming him Jehovah. Now if we graunt that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made parrable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoiled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title. The essence of God, if we beleue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essence maker of the Sonne. And so shall the Godhead of the Sonne be an abstract from the essence of God, or a derivation of a part out of the whole. Now must they needs graunt by their owne principallity, that the Holy Ghost is the Spirite of the Father onely. For if he be a derivation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirit of the Sonne: which is confused by the testimonie of Paul, where he maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreover, if the person of the Father be wiped out of the Trinitie, wherein shall he differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, but in this, that he only is God? They confesse Christ to be God, and yet they say, he differeth from the Father. Againe, there must bee some marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true Godhead of Christ to nothing, which cannot be without essence, yea, and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, unless he have some thing proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them answer, if he have not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe of a God were wicked. Beside that by this meanes they doe foulie teare in sunder the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, & perfectly common to the Father and the Son. And if that be true, then as touching the essence, there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say, that the Father in giving his essence, remaineth ever the same the onely God, with whom the essence abideth: then Christ shall be a figurative God, and a God onely in shew and in name but not in deed: because nothing is more proper to God, than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent me into you.

24. In a case by many places to prove it is false which they hold, that so oft as there is in Scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselves doe alledge, they fouily betray their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby...
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatively taken, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And their objection where they say, If the Father were not only the true God, he should himselfe be his owne Father, is answered with one worde. It is not inconvenient for degree and orders fake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not only of himselfe begotten his wisedome, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For if Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, he is called the Sonne of God, not only in respect that he was the eternall Worde before all worldes begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke vpon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to joyn vs vnto God. And because they do so boldly exclude the Son from the honor of God, I woulde faine knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounced, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, least perhappes they should take exception, and saye, that whatsoever goodnesse was in it, it came of free gifts. I ask whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they say nay, then we holde their vngodliness sufficiently convinced: in saying yea, they confound themselves. But whereas at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of God, that doth the more confirm our meaning. For flesh is the singular title of God alone, as much as he was after the common manner saluted by the name of God, in refusing false honour, hee did admonish them, that the goodnesse wherein he excelled, was the goodness that God hath. I ask also, where Paul affirmeth that only God is immortal, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortal, foolish, and false? Shall not hee then be immortal, that from the beginning was life to give immortalitie to Angels? Shall not he be wise, that is the eternall wisedome of God? Shall not the truth itselfe be true? I ask furthermore, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For hee claimeth this vnto himselfe, to have all knees bow before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will have that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against themselves, forasmuch as we see, that whatsoever pertaineth to God is given to Christ. And their caulation hath no place, that Christ was exalted in the flesh, wherein he had been abased, and that in respect of the flesh, al autenticke is given him in heauen and in earth: because although the majestie of king and Judge extendeth to the whole Person of the Mediatour, yet if he had not beene God openly shewed in flesh, he could not have beene advanced to such height, but that God should have disagreeed with himselfe. But this controversy Paul doeth well take away, reaching that he was equall with God before he did abase himselfe vnder the shape of a servant. Now howe could this equallie haue stonde together, vnlesse he had beene the same God whose name is 1ab and 1ebovah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is King of all the earth and Lord of the worldes? Now howsoever they babble against it, it cannot be taken from Christ which Esay saith in another place: He, i.e, is our God, for hee heauen waited, whereas in these words he describeth the comming of God the Redeemer, not only that should bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all points restore the Church. And with their other caulation they nothing precise, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though we confess that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detectable invention to say, that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this means either he should haue more essences than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they grant that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is unbegotten and unformed. I know this;

that many quicke noted men do laugh at this that we gather the distinction of Persons out of the words of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers do see how vainly and fondly Moses should bring in this as a tale of diuers together, if there were not in God mo Persons than one. Now certainly it, that they whom the Father spake vs were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, ye the one only God. Now therefore vnlesst they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authority of commanding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: it shall followe that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speech to other foreigne workmen. Finally one place shall easily answere two of their objections. For whereas Christ himselfe pronouceth that God is a spirit, this were not convenient to bee restrained to the Father onely, as if the Word himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spiritu doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended under the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worship him in spirit and truth: whereupon followeth another thing, because Christ doth vnder a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth give the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroy his owne Godhead, but by degrees to lift vs vp vnto it.

25 But in this they are deceived, that they dreame of certyne undivided singular things, whereof each have a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one effentuall God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy Ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his wisedome, therefore rightfully as is about-faid, he is counted the original and fountain of all the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quadrinatie, because falsely and caulsouly they ascribe vs vp to a deuile of their owne braines, as though we did faine that by determination there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is evident by our writings, that we do not drawe the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the persons were seuered from the essence, then peraduenture their reason were like to be true. But by that meanes it shoulde be a Trinitie of Gods and not of persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinitie, as though wee did imagine that there defend three gods out of it. And this excepcion growth of like foolishnes where they say, that then the Trinitie, shoulde be without God. For though it meet not to make vp the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none other wise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the Godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne is so much as he is God, of himselfe without respect of his person, but so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in olde time have spoken of the Trinitie, have onely applied this name to the Perions, forso much as it were not onely an aburdene error but also a grosser vngodliness, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will have these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, it is plain that they do destroy the essence of the Sonne and the holy Ghost, for else the parts joyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in suuerie distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing shoulde remaine in the Sonne

but a shadow, and the Trinitie should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures,

26 Whereas they object, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightly called the Son: to that we have already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father only, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as the madde men do fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is confounded that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the eternall life, that men beleue in thee the one true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediator, hee keepeth the degree that is meane betweene God and men: and yet is not his majestie thereby diminished. For though he abased himselfe, yet he left not with the Father his glorie that was hidden before the worlde. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrewes, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he stickeith not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, under this name of God is comprehended the Godhead which is his also. So when he saith to the Apostles: It is profitable that I go vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: He gieth not unto himselfe onely the second degree of Godhead to bee as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because having obtained the heavenly glorie, he gathereth together the faithful full to the partaking of it. He setteth his Father in the higher degree, intouching that glorious perfection of brightness that appeareth in heaven, differeth from that measure of glorie that was scene in him being clothed with flesh. After like manner in another place Paul faith: that Christ shall yeelde vp the kingdom to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more aburd than to take away eternall continuance from the Godhead of Christ. If he shall never cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alwaye remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that under the name of the Father, is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that lifting vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vs vp vnto himselfe, in as much as he is all one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawful nor right to exclusively to restrain the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, John doth for this cause affirmeth he is true God, that no man should thinke that he refriseth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of new Gods do meane, that while they confess Christ to be true God, yet they forthwith exclude him from the Godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the Godhead poured from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

27 Whereas they heap vp many places out of Irenæus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: this is either done of a basefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to have confirmed, that then the holy man had to do in disputacion with those firstrate men, that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in old time spake by Moses and the Prophets, but that he was I wot not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether maruell in this point, to make it plaine that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to denie any other, and therefore it is no maruell if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner nowe, whereas we are to stand against another sort of error, we may truly say that the God which in olde time appeared appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man object that it was the Father, our answer is in readiness; that when we strive to defend the Godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heed to this purpose of Irenæus, all that contention shall cease. And also by the sixt Chapter of the third booke; this whole strife is ended, where the good man standeth all upon this point, to prove that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God: is verily the one onely God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principal point whereupon stood all his disputation, as by the whole procefs thereof doth appear: and specially the 46. Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not very God in deed. Moreover in another place he faith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were joyntly called God by the Prophets and Apostles. Afterward he enuironneth how Christ which is Lord of all, and God, and Judge, receueth power from him which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subjection, because he was humbled even to the death of the croffe. And a little after he affirueth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gane the Law by the hand of Moses, and appeared to the Fathers. Now if any man doe prate that with Irenæus onely the Father is the God of Ifiæl, I will tune againe upon him that which the same writer plainly teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same as also he applieth unto him the Prophecie of Habacuc: God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose ferueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the living. And in the twelfth Chapter of the nine booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleueth God, because Christ is the maker of heauen and earth, and the onely God.

28 And with no more truth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For Tertullian as far though he be rough sometime and crabbed in his manner of speach, yet doth he plainly teach the summe of that doctrine that we defend. That is to say, whereas he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in unitie of substance, and yet that the same unitie by mysterie of orderly distribution is disposed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in state, but in degree, not in substance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He faith that he defendeth the Sonne to be a second next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places he sayeth that the Sonne is visible. But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is invisible in so much as he is the Word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his owne perfon, he proueeth himselfe farre from that errore which we confute. And though he doth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the next piece of his writing expounding himselfe, he sayeth, that he speaketh not exclusively in respect of the Sonne, because hee denieth that the Sonne is any other God beside the Father, and that therefore their soule governement is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his wordes. For he disputeth against Praxeas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many Gods nor the unitie to be funder. And because by the imaginaion of Praxeas Christ could not be God, but he must also be the Father, therefore so much laboureth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Worde and the Spirit a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kinde of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but onely to the disposition and order that belongeth onely to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangeth that: How many persons thinkest thou there are, O most forward Praxeas, but many so many as there be names? And so a little after that, they may beleue the Father and the Sonne eich in their names and Persones. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently

...ently confuted their impudence, that seek to beguile the simple with colour of Tertullian's authority.

29 And surely whosoever shall diligently compare together the writings of the old authors, shall finde no other thing in Irenæus, than that which hath been taught by other that came after. Iustus is one of the ancients, and he in all things doth agree with vs. Yet let them object that he as the rest doe, calleth the Father of Christ the onely. The same thing doth Hilary teach, yea, and speaketh more hardly, that the eternity is in the Father. But doe he that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet is he altogether in defence of the same Faith that we follow. Y.et are they not ashamed to pick out certaine mangled sentences whereby they would perswade that Hilary is a Patron of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will have that to be of any authoritie, let them prove that the Apostles made a Law for lent and such like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnsavorie than those fond trifles that are published under the name of Ignatius.

Wherefore their impudence is so much lesse tolerable, that disguise themselves with such visors to deceiue. Moreover the content of the ancient Fathers is plainly perceived by this, that at the Councell of Nice, Arius neuer durft allege for himselfe the authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greeks or Latines doth excuse himselfe and say, that he differeth from them that were before. It needed not to be spoken how Augustine whom these loselles doe most hate, hath dil-gently searched the writings of them all, and how reuerently he did embrace them.

Truely even in matters of least weight he vseth to shew what compelth him to differ from them. And in this matter, if he had read any thing doubtfull or darke in other, he hideth it not. But the doctrine that these men strive against, he taketh it as confessed, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath beene without contro-uerfie received. And by one word it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where he faith that in the Father is vntrie, in the first booke of Chriitian doctrine, will they say that he then forgave himselfe? But in another place he purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where he calleth the Father the be-ginnning of the whole Godhead, because he is of none: considering indeed wisely, that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if the beginning should not be reckoned at him, the single vntrie of God cannot be conceived. By this I trust the Godly reader will perceiue that al the cavilations are confuted, wherwith Saran hath hither attempted to perturbe or darken the pure truth of doctrine.

Finally, I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiofitie, and not more greedily than meete is, fecke for comberfome and entangled disputes. For I take not in hand to please them, that doe delight in an vntemperate desire of speculation. Truely I have omitted nothing of little purpose that I thought to make against me, but while I studie to edifie the Church, I thought it best to leave many things vtouched which both finally profited, and would greefe the readers with superfluous tediousnes. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father doe alwaies beget? For as much as it is folly to faie a continual act of begettting, it is evident that from eternity there have been three Persons in God.

The xiiiij. Chapter.

Ehot sao. 21.
The currencte of the world taught by Moses, that

Althrough Ehes doth worthily reproch the worshippers of falle gods with flothfulfilling, for that they have not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and round compalle of the heavens, which is the true God: yet such is the dulcaste

and grossnes of our wit, that least the faithfull should fall away to the intentions of the Gentiles, it was necessary to have God more expressly painted out into them.
For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the world, which is computed the most tolerable description that is found among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behooeth vs more familiarly to know him, least we always waver in doubtfullnesse.
Therefore it was his pleasure to have a history of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seek for none other God but him, whom Moses hath declared to be the maker and builder of the world. There is first set foorth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the first originall of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is very necessary, not onely to confute those monstrous fables that sometime were spread in Egypt and other partes of the world, but also, that the beginning of the world onc being known, the eternitie of God may more clearly shine forth and ratifie vs in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moved with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, Sith he might have made it many thousand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the world that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to six thousand yeeres. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because if mans minde will travaile to attaine thereunto, it shall faile an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himselfe to prove the modestie of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godly olde man speake, which when a wanton fellow did in scorne demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answere, that he builded Hell for curiousfooles. Let this grave and feuer warning re-prefe the wantonnesse that tickleth many, yea, and driveth them to euill and hurt-full speculations. Finally, let vs remember that the same invisible God whose wis-dome, power and justice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the history of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his holy image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are grown dimme with age, or dulled with any diseas, doe not deeme any thing plainly, vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so, such is our weakenes, that vnlesse the Scripture direct vs in seeking of God, we doe forthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that follow their owne wantonnesse, because they be now warned in vaine, shall all too late seele with horrible destruction, how much it had been better for them reuerently to receive the secret counsels of God, than to vomite out blasphemies, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightly doth Augustin complain, that wrong is done to God when further cause of things is sought for, than his only will. The same man in another place doth wisely warne vs, that it is no wise euill to move question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For how broad soe-cuer the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Now, if one should quarrell with God for that the emptines wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Into like madness run they that busie themselves about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the world innumerable ages sooner. To satysfie their owne greedines of minde, they couet to passe without the compass of the world, as though in so large a circuit of heauen, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their imeasurable brightnes may overwhelm all our senses: as though in sixe thousand yeeres, God hath not shewed examples, in continual consideration whereof, our minds may be exercized. Let vs therefore willingly abide enclosed within those boundes wherewith it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our minde, that they should not stray abroad with libertie of wandring.

2. For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended

The devi'ding of the creation into

in a moment but in sixe daies. For by this circumstance we are withdrawn from forging inuencions to the one only God that devided his works into sixe daies, that it should not greeue vs to be occupied all the time of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soever wee turne them, are compelled to looke vpon the workes of God, yet see we how fickle our head is, and if any godly thoughts doe touch vs, how loone they passe away. Here againe mans reason murrurneth, as though such proceedings were disagreeing from the power of God, vsntill such time as being made subject to the obedience of faith, the learner to keepe that rest wherunto the hallowing of the sennth day calleth vs. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be considered the fatherly love of God toward mankind, in this: that he did not creat Adam vsntill he had stored the world with all plentie of good things, For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and empty, if he had giuen him life before that there was any light, he shoulde have seemed not so well to provide for his commoditie. But now where he first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the use of man, and furnished the earth, the waters & the aire with living creatures, & brought forth abundance of fruits to suffice for food, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident housholder, he vwed his maruellous bountie toward vs. If a man do more heedfully vey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse and publister of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I have alreadie declared, that he speakest not there only of the bare essence of God, but also setteth forthe vsntill vs his eternall Wisdome and Spirit, so the ende we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be known by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because, though Moses applying himselfe to the rudeenes of the common people, reciteth in his history of the creation no other works of God but such as are scene with our eyes, yet whereas afterwarde he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easily gather, that he was the creator of them in whome service they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacitie of the people, doth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrarie, but that we may plainly & expressly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his works, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Becaue that, this point of doctrine is very necessarie for the confuting of manie errors. The excellency of the nature of Angels hath so daefeled the minde of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subject to the authoritie of one God, & brought as it were in obedience. And hereupon were they fained to be Gods. There rose vp also one Manicheus with his sect, which made themselves two originall beginnings of things, God, and the deuil, and to God he assigned the beginning of good things, and of things of euill nature he determined the deuill to be the author. If our minde should be entingled with this error, God should not keepe whole his glorie in the creation of the world. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himself as I may so terme it, they which giue that vnto the diuell, do they not in a maner giue him the title of Godhead? Now where is the almightiness of God become, if such authoritie be granted to the diuell, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay and withstand it? As for the onely foundaition that the Manicheuses have, that it is unlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euil: that nothing hurteth the true faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euil in the whole naturallitie of the world, because neither the fowardness and malice both of man and the diuell, nor the sins that... that proceed thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and justice. Therefore to answer these peruser des devises: it behooveth vs to lift vp our munday higher than our eyes can attain to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the N@tene creed God is called the Creator of all things, things insensible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godliness appointed, lest the readers with searching to understand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being led away from the simplicitie of Faith. And surely, forasmuch as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alway for our profit, and such things are as finall available to edifie, he doth either leape wholly vnspaken, or but lightly, and as it were overrunningly touch them: it shall be also our dutie to be content not to know those things that do not profit vs.

4. That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordained to execute his commandements, are also his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all question. To more doubt of the time and order that they were created in, though it not rather be a busie wairwardnesse than diligence. Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heavens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to search, what day the other more secret armies of heaven beside the flarres and planets first began to be? But, because I will not be long, let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modestie and sobrietie, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor thinke, nor yet desire to know any other thing than that hath been taught vs by the Word of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest vs. upon the searching and studying of such things as certaine to edification, and not gue ourselves to curiositie or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was God's pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in sound godliness, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holiness: let vs rest vs. upon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, we must leave those vanities that idle men have taught without warrant of the word of God, concerning the nature, degree, and multitude of Angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken holde of, and are more pleasant unto them than such things as lie in daily vs. But if it greeue vs not to be the scholler of Christ, let it not greeue vs to follow that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shall it so come to passe, that being contented with his schooling, we shall not onely forbear, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same De- nys, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both littely and witulie in his Hierarchie of Heauen: but if a man examine it more neerely, he shall finde that for the most part it is but mean babbling. But the dutifull Pamela of a Divine is, not to delie eares with prating, but to stablishe consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable. If one should read that booke, he would thinke that the man were flipp'd downe from heauen, and did tell of things not that he had learned by heare, but that he had seen with his eyes. But Pamela which was ratified above the third heauen, hath uttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawful for man to speake the secrets that he had seen. Therefore bidding farewell to that trifflation wise done, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would have vs know concerning his Angels.

5. It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heavenly Spirits, whose ministration and service God voucheth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is given them, because God vouchthem as messengers, to shew himselfe vs. men. And upon like reason are derived the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they doe like a Gard environ their Prince, and doe adorne and set forth the honorable er, dominions, thrones, Gods.

of his majesty, and like soldiery they are always attending upon the ensigne of their captain, & are ever so prepared & in readiness to do his commandments, that so soon as he doth but beckon to them, they prepare themselves to work, or rather be at their works already. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royalty, the other Prophets do describe, but principally Daniel, where he faith, that when God set him down in his throne of judgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them marvellously shew forth and declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named Strengths, because he exerciseth and worketh his authority in the world by them, therefore they are somtimes called principalities, somtimes powers, somtimes Dominions. Finally, because in them as it were fitted the glorie of God, for this caufa also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the holy Ghost often worketh those other former names to advance the dignity of the ministrie of Angels. For it were not reason that those instruments should be let pass without honor, by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his majesty. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministrie, as in a looking glasse, they partly represent vs vs the godhead. Although indeed I mislike not this that the old writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, where the scripture faith, that the Angel of God appeared unto Abraham, Jacob, Moses, & other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels in deed, this name is given unto them. And that ought to seeme no maruell, for if this honor be given to princes and governors, that in their office they stand in the stead of God that is soueraine king and judge, much greater cause there is why it should be given to the Angels, in whom the brightness of the glorie of God much more abundantly shineth.

But the scripture standeth most upon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith; that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributers and administratours of God's bounty toward vs. And therefore the scripture receiveth, that they watch for our safety, they take upon them the defence of vs, they direct our waiues, they take care that no hurtful thing betide vs. The sentences are variatious, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithful. He hath given his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waiues. They shall bare thee vp in their hands, least thou chance to hit thy feete against a stone. Againe, the Angel of the Lorde standeth rounde about them that feare him, and he doth deliuere them. Whereby God heareth that he appointed to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her mistres. God promiseth to Abraham his servant an Angel to be the guide of his journey. Jacob in blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh prayeth, that the Angel of the Lord by whom he himselfe had beene deliuered from all enimes may make them prosper. So the Angel was set to defend the tents of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskeh Israel out of the hands of their enimies, he raised vp reuengers by the ministrie of Angels. So finally (to the end I need not to rehearse many more) the Angels ministred to Christ and were ready affilient to him in all necessitues. They brought tidings to the women of his resurrection, and to the disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the devill and all enimies, and doe execute the vengeance of God upon them, that are bent against vs. As wee read that the Angel of God to deliuere Hierusalem from the siege, he in one night a hundred fowercore and five thousand in the camp of the king of Assyria.

But whether to cuerie of the faithful be a seuerall Angell assigned for their defence,

defence, I dare not certainly affirm. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angel of the Persians, and the Angel of the Grecian, he sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdomes and provinces certaine Angels appointed as governours. And when Christ faith that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of the Father, hee seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whom the preservation of them is given in charge. But I cannot tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euer one hath his Angel set over him. But this is to be holden for certaintie, that not one Angel only hate care of every one of vs, but that all by one consent do watch for our saftie. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more reioyce of one sinner converted to repentance, than of ninetie and nine iuft that have stand full in their righteousness. And it is said of no Angels than one, that they conveyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elyzaues shew to his servant so many firene chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that seemeth more plaine than the rest to proove this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doors of the house where the brethren were assembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they saide it was his Angell. It shoulde seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to euer of the faithfulfull are assigned their Angels for governours.

Alberty yet here it may be answered that it may well bee, notwithstanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may think it was any one Angell, to whom God did give charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to euer one two Angels, as it were douers ghosts, a good Angell and a badde. But it is not woorth thesaile, curiously to search for that whiche doth not much import vs to knowe. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heaven do watch for his safetie, I doe not see what he can be the better, if he understand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraine vs to one Angell the care that God hath to euer one of vs, do great wrong to themselfes, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had bee vainly promised vs, wherewith being enmononed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take upon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, and with Jude, the Archangell. And Paul faith, it shall be an Archangell that shall with sound of trumpet calmen the judgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angells, or differente one from another by speciall marks, and appoint euer one his place and standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael and Gabriel: and if you lift to add the thirde out of the historic of Tobie, may by their significication seeme to be givenn to the Angels, according to the capacite of our weaknes, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christes mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousand, the servant of Elyzaues fawe many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, that doe campe rounde about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that spirits have none, and yet the Scripture for the capacite of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubim and Seraphim paint vs our Angels with wings, to the intent we should not doubt that they will be euery with incredible swiftnesse, readie to succour vs, so soone as need shal require, as if the lightning sent from heaven should flye vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. Whatsoever more than this may be fought of both thefe points, let vs beleue it to be of that sort of mysteries, whereof the full recutation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiousie in searching and too much boldnesse in speaking.

9 But his one thing which many troublesome do call in doubt, is to be holden for

for certaine, that Angels are ministering spirits, whose service God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom hee both distribueth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other works in execution. It was in the old time the opinion of the Saddu- ces, that by Angels is meant nothing else, but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this error out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is maruell that so groffe ignorance could be suffered in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before allaged, where are recited thousands and Legions of Angels: where joy is giuen vnto them: where it is said that they vphold the faithfull with their hands, and care their foules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby it is cleerely proved, that they are indeed spirits of a nature that hath substance. For whereas Stephen and Paul doe say, that the law was giuen by the hande of Angels, and Christ faith, that the elect after the resurrection shall be like vnto angels: that the day of judgement is not knowne to the vrie Angels: that he that then come with his holy Angels: howsoever they be withit, yet must they be bee vnderstan- ded. Likewhile, when Paul charged Timothy before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commandements, hee meaneth not qualitie or inspirations without substance, but vnto spirits. And otherwise it staideth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that Christ is becom more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made suueect vnto them: that Christ took vpo him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the blessed Spirits, to whom may these comparisions agree? And the author of that Epistle expoundeth himselfe, where he placeth in the kingdom of heaven the foules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we haue allready allaged, that the Angels of children doe alway behalde the face of God, that they do reioyce at our safeties, that they maruell at the manifold grace of God in the Church, that they are subiect to Christ, the head. To the same purpose serveth this, that they so oft appeered to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediataur, is called an Angell. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages ago raised by Satan do now and then spring vp again.

10 Now it resteth, that we secke to meet with that superstition which is commonly wont to crepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers & delinuers of all good things vnto vs. For by & by many reason fallth to this point, to think that therefore al honor ought to be giuen them. So commeth it to pass, that those things which belong onely to God & Christ, are conuoyer away to Angels. By this meane we fee that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many waies obscure, when angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with incommasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more auncient than this. For it appeareth that Paul himselfe had much to do with some which so advanced angels, that they in maner would haue brought Christ vnder subiectio. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the author of all the good things that they have: to the end we should not for sake him & turne vnto them, which cannot sufficiently helpe themselves, but are faine to drawe out of the fame fountaine that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shined in them a certaine brightness of the maiestie of God, there is nothing whereunto we are more easily enclined, then with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, and to giue vnto them all things that are due onely to God. Which thing John in the Revelation con- fesseth to haue channell to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this an- swere, See thou it not. For I am thy fellow servant, Worship God.
11 But this danger we shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to provide for the safetie of the faithfull, and to communicate the gifts of his liberalitie among them. Surely he doth not this of necessitie, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an oneley beke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to ease him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weaknesses, so that we want nothing that may auante our minudes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough against for vs, that the Lord affirmeth that he is our protector. But while wee see our suelues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weaknesses and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, unless the Lord after the proportion of our capacitie doe make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meanes he not onely promiseth that he will have care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whom he hath given in charge to trauell for our safetie, and that so long as we be compassed with the garnision and support of them, whatsoever danger betideth, we be without all reach of hurt. I grant we doe amisse that after this simple promis of the protection of God alone, we still looke about from whence other helpe may come vnto vs. But for so much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite Clemencie and gentleness to helpe this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglech his so great benefite. An example thereof we have in the servant of Elizeu, which when he sawe the hill besieged with the armie of the Syrains, and that there was no way open to escape, was striken downe with feare, as if his miffier and he were then utterly destroyed. Then Elizeu prayed God to open his servants eyes, and by and by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and sicke chariotes,that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his hart againe, and was able with a dreadful minde to looke downe vpon his enemies, with sight of whom he was before in a maner driven out of his wit.

12 Wherefore whatsoever is said of the ministrie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that overcomming all distresse, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore provided vs of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeu, that there be no man on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against ordre of reaone, that we should be led away from God by Angels, which are ordained for this purpose, to testify that his helpe is more present among vs? But they doe leade vs away in deed, if they doe not freight leade vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eie vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his handes that mooue themselves to no worke but by his direction: if they doe not holde vs fast in the one Mediator Christ, so that we may hang wholly of him, lean all vpon him, be carried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Jacob, ought to stickie and be fastened in our mindes, how Angels descend downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe goe vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lorde of hostes. Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open and the Angels descending to the sonne of man, John 1.51. Therefore the servant of Abraham being committed to the custodie of the Angel, doth not therefore call vpon the Angel to helpe him, but holpen with that commendation, he praeth to the Lorde, and beseecheth him to shew his mercie to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them ministers of his power and goodnesse, to the intent to part his glory with them:

them: so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministration, that we shoulde divide our confidence betweene him and them. Let vs therefore forfake that Platonick philosophers, to secke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose, that they may make God more gentle vnto vs, which superfluous and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day doe continue to bring into our religion.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning diuels, they tende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be carefull to beware aforehande of their awaitinges and preparations, and furnish our felues with such weapons as are strong and sure enough to drive away euen the strongeist enemies. For whereas Satan is called the God and prince of the world, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion: these descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more wary and watchfull, and readier to enter in battell with him. Which is also sometime set out in express words. For Peter after he had saide, that the diuell goeth about like a roaring Lion, seeking whome he may deuoure, by and by addeth this exhortation, that we strongly refist him by faith. And Paul after he had given warning that we wraffe not with flesh and bloud, but with the princes of the aire, the powers of darkness, and spirituall wickednesse, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great and dangerous a battell, Wherefore let vs also apply al to this end, that being warned how there doth continually approch vpon vs an enemie, yea, an enemie that is in courage most hardie, in strength most mightie, in policies most subtle, in diligence and celeritie vnwearable, with all forces of engins plentiously furnished, in skill of warre most readie, we suffer not our felues by flie, and cowardice to be surprised, but on the other side with bolde and hardie minde set our foote to refist him (and because this warre is onely ended by death) encourage our felues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weakness and vnskilfulness, let vs call upon the helpe of God and enterprize nothing but vpon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, strength, courage and armour.

14 And that we should be the more stirred vp and enforced to doe, the Scripture warmeth vs, that there are not one or two or a fewe enimies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is said, that Mary Magdalene was delitered from seuen diuels, wherewith she was possesse. And Christ saith, that it is the ordinary custome, that if after a diuell be once cast out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth seuen spirits worse than himselfe, and returneth into his poftition, finding it emptie. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that we must fight with an infinite multitude of enimies, least defying the fawning of them, we shoule be more slacke to enter in battell, or thinkeing that we have some respite in the mean time granted, we should giue our felues to idle-nessse. Whereas many times Satan or the diuell is named in the singular number, thereby is meant that power of wickednesse which standeth against the kingdom of Justice. For as the Church and the fellowship of Saints haue Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, that hath the chief ethe authoritie among them. After which manner this is spoken. Go ye cursed into eternal fire that is prepared for the diuell and his angels.

15 Here also this ought to stirre vs vp to a perpetually warre with the diuell, for that he is everywhere called the enemie of God and of vs. For if we haue regard of Gods glory, as it is meete we shoulde, then ought we with all our force to bende our felues against him, that goeth about to extinguish it. If we be affectioned to maintain the kingdome of Christ as we ought, then must we needs use such an vnappellable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Again, if any care of our owne safetie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him, that continually continually lieth in wait for the destruction of it. Such one is he described in the third Chapter of Genesis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honour, and throveth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Evangelists, where he is called an enemie, & is said to scatter tares, to corrupt the seed of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murthrer, and a lyer, we finde by experience in all his doings. For he affaileth the truth of God with lies, obscureth the light with darknesse, entangleth the minde of men with errors, raiseth vp hatreds, kindleth contentions and strifes, doth all things to this end to overthrow the kyngdome of God, and drowne men with himselfe in eternal destruction. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature frowarde, spitefull and malicious. For needs must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to afsaile the glorie of God and salvation of men. And that doth John speake of in his Epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine and principal workman of all malice and wickednes.

16 But forasmuch as the duell was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which we assigne in his nature, is not by creation, but by depravation. For whatsoever damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne revolting & fall. Which the scripture therefore guesth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, we should ascribe that to God himselfe which is far-theft from him. For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lies, and addeth a cause why, for that he fload not still in the truth. Now when he fath that he fload not still in the truth, he foweth that once he had been in the truth. And when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this from him, that he can not lay that fault to God whereof he himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose, to deliver the majestie of God from all slander. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning duells? Many perhaps doe gudge, that the Scripture doth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things do nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not becominge for the holy Ghost to feed curiousie with vaine histories without any fruite: and we see that it was the Lorde's purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we should learne to edification. Therefore, learne we our histories should tariie long vpon things superfluous, let us be content shortly to know that much concerning the nature of Dauiels, that at the first creation they were the Angels of God; but by twarning out of kinde, they both destroyed themselves and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to bee knowne, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude.
God spared not (Iay they) his angels which had sinned, and not kept then beginning, but had fortaken then dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels, doth without doubt secrely by implication set the reproue Angels in comparison against them.

17. As for the discord and strife that we say is between God and Satan, we must so take it that still we hold this for certaine, that he can do nothing but by the will and sufferance of God. For we read in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receive his commandements, and durst not go forward to do any enterprise till he had obtained licence. So when Ahab to be deceived he tooke upon him Ps.1.34.

Cap. 14. Of the knowledge of

Of the Egyptians by the evil angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally tell it, that the binding of the wicked is the work of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is evident therefore that Satan is under the power of God, and so governed by his authority that he is compelled to do him service. Now when we say that Satan resieth God, that the works of Satan disagree with the works of God, we do therewith affirm that this disagreement and strife hangeth upon the su[re]nce of God. I speak not now of his will, nor of his endeavor, but of the effect only. For the diuell is wicked of nature, he is not inclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly carried to stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he will standeth God. And by this wickednesse he is stirred vp to the entering of those things that he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast and restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth only those things that are granted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to apply his service wheretoever God compeleth him.

Satan beareth not full sway over the faithful, nor the wicked he reigneth at pleasure.

18. Now because God boweth the unclean Spirites, hither and thither as pleased him, he so tempereth this governement, that they exercise the faithful with battles, they set upon them out of ambushes, they affaire them with incursions, they press them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them afraid, and sometime wound them, but never overcome nor oppress them. But the wicked they subdue and drawe away, they raighe upon their foules and bodies, and abuse them as bondslaves to all murtherous doings. As for the faithful because they are vnquited of such enemies, therefore they hear these exhortations. Do not give place to the diuell. The diuell your enimie goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom he may devour, whom perchance being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kinde of strife, when he faith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was given to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Sathan's head, pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore I say, that the faithful can never be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times stricken downe, but they are never so affrighted with all, but that they recover themselves. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised vp againe: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they do labour in all the course of their life that in the end they obtain the victorie: but I speak not of this of every doing of theirs. For we know that by the just vengeance of God David was for a time given over to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause Paul faith there is hope of pardon, although any have been entangled with the faires of the diuell. Therefore in another place the same Paul faith, that the promise aboue allaged is begun in this life, wherein we must wrestle, and is performed after our wrestling ended: when he faith, the God of peace shal shortly beate downe Satan vnder your feete, This victorie hath alwaye fully beene in our head Christ, because the Prince of the world had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doth now partly appeare, and shall be perfected, when being unclothed of our flesh by which we are yet subject to weakenesse, we shall be full of the power of the Holy Ghost. In this manner when the kingdom of Christ is raised vp and advanced, Satan with his power fallith downe, as the Lord himselfe faith. I have Satan fall as a lightning downe from heaven. For by this answer he confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Againe, When the Prince possesteth his owne palace, all things that bee possesteth are in peace, but when there commeth a stranger, he is thrown out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying overcame Satan which had the power of death, and and triumphed upon all his armies, that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would every moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakness, and what is his furious strength) how could we stand, yea neuer for little time against his manifold and continual assaults, but being supported by the victory of our captain? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuell to raigne over the foules of the faithfull, but only delivereth him the wicked and unbelieving to goyerne, whom God doth not vouchsafe to have reckoned in his flocke. For it is said, that he posseth this world without controversie till he be thrust out by Christ. Again, that he doth blinde all them that beleue not the Gospell. Again, that he performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and woefully, for all the wicked are the vefilds of his wrath. Therefore, to whom should they be rather subject than to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally, they are saide to be of their Father the Diuell, because as the faithfull are hereby knowne to be the children of God, because they beare his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kind, are properly discerned to be his children.

19 As we have before confuted that trifling Philosophe concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God uttereth in the minde of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly say, that diuelles are nothing else but evil affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may we shortly doe, because there are many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough upon this point. First, where the vnclene Spirites are called Angels, Apostates, which have swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the vrie names doe sufficiently expresse, that they are not motions or affections of minde, but rather indeede as they be called minde or Spirites endued with sense and understanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and John doe compare the children of God with the children of the Diuell; were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of the Diuell signified nothing else but evil inspirations? And John addeth somewhat more plainly, that the Diuell sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Jude bringeth in Michael the Archangel fighting with the diuell, doubtlesse he setteth against the good Angel an euill and rebellious Angel. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Job, that Satan appeareth with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the judgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Some of David, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Against, Go ye cursed into euerneall fire that is prepared for the Diuell and his Angels. Again, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deluercd them into chaunces of darknesse to be kept vnto damnation, &c. Howe fondle shoulde these speeches bee, that the Diuells are ordered to euerneall judgement, that fire is prepared for them, that they are nowe already tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuells at all? But because the matter needeth no disputacion among them that beleue the word of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among, those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is now: I suppose I have performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly minde should be furnished against such fondle errours, wherewith vnquiet men doe trouble both themselves and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they think they have none to stande against them, should wake more lowe and vnproviding to refrift.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearesome vnto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinarie worke of God. For, as I have elsewhere already saide, though this bee not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine

The consideration of things which God hath creased is strangefull.

the doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way soever we turne our eyes, all that we see are the works of God, and with godly consideration to wey for what ende God did make them. Therefore that we may conceive by Faith so much as behooueth vs to knowe of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the world, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterwarde more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basilie and Ambrose. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his wordes and Spiritue created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all living creatures, and things without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of things, to every thing he gave the proper nature assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidings, and where all things are subject to corruption, yet hath he so provided, that of all fortes some shall bee preferred to the last day, and therefore some he cherisith by secret meanes, and powreth now and then, as it were a newe luelinenesse into them, and to some he hath gien the power to increase by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not die together. So hath he maruellsouly garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plentie, varietie and beautie of all things as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and storid with abundance of most finely chosen flowers, laid of all how in framing man and adorning him with so goodly beautie, and with so many and so great gifts, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to have once againe touched these few things by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller understanding of this matter out of Moses, and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conveyed the historie of the world by writing to perpetua memorie.

21 It is to no purpose to make much ado in disputing, to what end the consideration of the worikes of God ought to tend, or to what matter it ought to be applied: for as much as in other places already a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe words be ended. Truly, if we were minded to set out as it is woorthis, how imestimable wifedome, power, justice, and goodnesse of God appeareth in the framing of the worlde, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largeness of so great a matter. And no doubt, it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasse the infinite riches of his wifedome, justice, bountie and power, we should not run over them, as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandering looke, as I may so call it, but that we should with consideration rest long upon them, cast them up and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeat them with remembrance. But because we are now busied in that kinde of teaching, it is meete that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short, let the readers knowe that then they have conceived by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen and earth, if they fist follow this vntierfull rule, that they passe not over with not considering or forgetfulness of those verses, that God presenteth to be scen in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselves, that they may therewith be thorougly moued in their harts. The fist of those we doe when we consider how excellent a workemans worke it was to place and apply set in so well disposed order the multitude of the stars that is in heauen, that nothing can be ducife more beautifull to behold: to set and fasten some of them in their standing so that they cannot move, and to other some, to grant a free course, but so that in moueing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may divide in measure the daies and nightes, monethes, yeeres, and seauens of the yeere, and to bring this inequality of daies which we daily see to such a tempered order, that it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we mark his power in sustaining so great a body, in governing the so swift whirling about of the engine of heaven, and such like. For these few examples do sufficiently declare, what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should trawl as I said, to express it all in words, I should never make an end, for as much as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodness, so many examples of his wisdom, as there be forms of things in the world, yeas, as there be things either great or small.

Now the other part which commeth nearer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard and safety, and therefore do feel his power and grace in our selves, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed upon us: we may thereby see all our selves to the truth, invocation, praise and love of him. Now, as I have before said, God himself hath shewed in the very order of creation, that for man sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he devised the making of the world into five days, whereas it had been as easy for him in one moment to have in all points accomplished his whole work, as it was by such proceeding from peace to peace to come to the end of it. But then it pleased him to shew his providence and fatherly carefulness toward us, that before he made man he prepared all that he foresaw should be profitable for him and fit for this preservation. How great unthankfulness now should it be to doubt, whether this good Father do care for us, whom he see to have been careful for us ere that we were born? How wicked were it to tremble for distrust leaf his goodness would at any time leave us destitute in necessitie, which we see was displeased for us being not yet borne, with great abundance of all good things? Beside that we hear by Moses that by his liberality all that ever is in the world is made subject to us: sure it is that he did it not to mock us with an emptie name of gift. Therefore we shall never lack any thing, so far as it shall be available for our preservation. Finally to make an end, so oft as we name God the creator of heaven and earth let this come in our minds withall, that the disposition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand & power, & that we are his children whom he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring vp: that wee may looke for all good things at his hand, and assuredly, that hee will never suffer us to lacke things needfull for our safety, to the end our hope should hang upon none other: that whatsoever we desire, our praiers may be directed to him: of what thing soever we receive profit, we may acknowledge it to be his benefit, and confess it with thanks giving: that being allured with so great sweetness of his goodness and liberalitie, we may studie to love and honour him with all our heart.

What a one man was created: wherein there is entreatied of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integrity of nature.

Now we must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the works of God the most noble and most excellent example of his justice, wisdom and goodness: but also because as we have said in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, vnlesse we have withall a mutual knowledge of our selves. Although the same knowledge be of two forts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profite for vs to know our creation, vnlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformity of our nature:) yet at this time we wil be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thrall dorne, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For wee must take heed that in precisely declaring only the natural evils of man, we seem not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh himselfe to have sufficient defense in this color, if it may lay for himselfe that whatsoever fault she hath, she same did after a certaine manner proceed from God, and sticketh not if she be accused, to quarrel with God, and to lay the fault upon him whereof she is worthily accused. And they that would seem to speake somewhat more reverently of the maligne of God, yet do willingly seek to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein thou not openly they blame God also, to whose reprooch it should fall if it were proued that there is any fault in nature. Sich then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the wights to escape, whereby the thinketh the blame of her owne evils may any waye be put off from her, we must diligently travel to meet with this mischeife. Therefore we must so handle the calamite of mankind that we cut off all excuse, and deliver the justice of God from all accusation. Afterwardes in place convenient we shall see how farre men be now from that pureness that was guien to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a bridle was put upon his pride, for there is no greater abfurde than for them to glory in their excellencie, that do not onely dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselves in part but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vesse, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortal Spirite, Adam might inly glory in so great liberalitie of his maker.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule and body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortal essence, and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometime it is called the Spirite. And when these two names Soule and Spirit are joyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirit is set by it selfe it meaneeth as much as Soule. As, when Solomon speaking of death, faith that then the Spirite returneth to him that gave it. And Christ commending his Spirite to his Father, and Stephen his Spirite to Christ doe both meaneth none other thing, but that when the Soule is delivered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirite, because it is a breath or a power by God inspir'd or poureed into bodies which yet hath no essence: both the thing itselfe, and all the Scripture there-eth, that they doe too grossly erre. True it is, that while men are fastned to the earth more than they ought to be, they waxe dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darkenesse, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine alioke after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkenesse, but that they bee touched with some feeling of immortallitie. Surelie the conscience which discerning betweenne good and evil, answe-rueth the judgement of God, is an unoubted signe of an immortal Spirite. For howe could a motion without essence attaine to come to the judgement sate of God, and throwe it selfe into fear, by finding his owne guiltinesse? For the body is not moued with fear of a Spirituall paine, but that falleth only vpon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the Soule hath an essence. Moreover the vrey knowl-ledge of God doth proue that the soules which ascende vppre about the worlde are immortall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attaine to the fountain of life. Finally, forasmuch as so manie excellent gifts wherewith mans minde is endued, doe cru out that there is some divine thing engraven in it, there are even so many testimonies of an immortal essence. For that sense which is in brute beastles, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things prettely set before it. But the imblences of the minde of man which vieweth}

the heaven and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in understanding and memorie, digesteth cerie thing in order, and gathereth things to come by thinges past, doth plainly shew that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing severall from the body. We conclude by understanding the invisibll God and Angels, which the body cannot doe. We know things that be right, just, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the spirit is the state of this understanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selle, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witnesse of immortalitie, forasmuch as it doth not only minister unto vs, thoughts of those thinges that never were done, but also foreknowings of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which even profane writers do excellently set out with more gorgious garnishment of words: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by its selfe seuerall from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remove out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we doe put of that which is corruptible, finally at the last day we may receive reward according to that he hath behaue him selfe in his body. For these places and other that we doe ech where commonly light upon, doe not onely manifestly distinguishe the soule from the body, but also in giving to the soule the name of man do shew that it is the principal part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithfull to cleanse themselves from all defiling of the flesh and the Spirit, he maketh two parts of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sinne. And Peter where he calleth Christ the shepherd and bishop of soules, should have spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conveniently stand together which he faith of the eternall salvation of soules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he faith that euill desires doe fight against the soule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews faith, that the Pastors doe watch that they may yeeld account for our soules, unless it were true that soules had a proper offence. To the same purpose serveth it that Paul calleth God for witnesse to his owne soule, because it could not be called in judgement before God unless it were subject to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to seare him, which after that he hath killed the body, can throwe the soule into hell sier. Now where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews doth distinguish the Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the onely Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirm the offence of Soules. Moreover, if the soules remained not alive being delivered from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly have brought in the soule of Lazarus lying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe, the soule of the rich man subject to horrible torments. The same thing doth Paul confirm, when he teacheth that we wander abroad from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enjoy his presence being out of the flesh. But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will adde onely this out of Luke, that it is reckoned among the errors of the Sadduces, that they did not beleue that there were any Spirits and Angels.

3 Also a strong proove hereof may be gathered of this, where it is said, that man is create like to the Image of God. For although the glory of God doe appear in the outward shape of man, yet is it no doubt that the proper state of the Image of God is in the Soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape in much as the same doth distinguish and seuer vs from brute beasts, we do also therein more nearly approch to God then they: neither will I much stand against them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the Image of God, that where all other living creatures doe groulingwise behold the ground, to man is given an upright face, and he is commanded to looke upon the heauen, and to aduance his countenance toward man was creased like to God, nor in the fashion of his body, nor because he was framed according to the shape which the soule of God should afterwards take vs.

Gen. 1:16.

...toward the starrs: so that this remaine certaine, that the image of God which ap-peareth or shineth in these outward signes, is spiritual. For Ofander (whom his writings declare to have beene in stille imaginations fondly witty) referring the image Of God without difference, as well to the bodie as to the foule, mingeth heauen and earth together, For he faith, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stand without falling, yet shold Christ haue become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed.
But where shall he finde that Christ is the image of the Spiritie? I grant undeide that in the person of the Mediator shineth the glory of the whole godhead. But how shall the eternall word be called the image of the Spiritie whom he goeth before in order?
Finally, it overthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, if he doe here calle him his image. Moreover I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy Ghost in the fleth that he tooke vpon him, and by what markes and features he doth express the likenesse of him. And whereas this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe, which is against all reason. Beside this, if Ofanders intendment be beleued, man was fashioned only after the figure and patern of Christ in that he was man, and so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with fleth, whereas the Scripture in another meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their little intendment is more colourable which do thus expound it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like unto Christ, which is the only image of God. But that expostution albeit is not found. Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenes, while they seeke a difference betweene those two words, where is no difference at all, saying, that this word Likenes is added to expound the other. First we know that among the Hebrous such repetitions are common, wherein they express one thing twice: and in the thing it selfe there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God.
Whereby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which doe so subtlyly argue about the words, whether they appoint Zellem, that is to say, Image, in the substance of the soule, or Demuth, that is to say, Likenesse in the qualities, or what other thing soever it be that they teach. For whereas God determined to create man after his own image, this being somewhat darkely spoken, he doth as by way of explication repeat it in this saying, After his likenes: as if he would have fayd, that he would make man, in whom he would represent him selfe as in an image, because of the marks of likenes grauen in him. And therefore Moses a little after reiterating the same thing, doth repeat the image of God twice, leaving out the name of Likenes. And it is a trifling obiection that Ofander makest, that not a part of man, or the soule only with the gifts thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuen him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I say, will all readers that haue their found wit judge this objection. For where whole man is called mortal, yet is not the soule thereby made subject to mortallite. Again, where he is called a living creature endowed with reason, it is not thereby ment, that the body hath reason and understanding. Although therefore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not convenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I hold still that principle which I have before stablished, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellencie, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kind of living creatures. Therefore in that worde is not the intendment that man had when he was endued with right understanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, and all his senses governed in right order, and when in excellen giftes he did truly resemble the excellencie of his Creator. And though the principall force
The excellency wherein man ressembled God, consisted in knowledge, and holiness, not in the number of the faculties of his mind, nor in the power which God gave him other other creatures.

Whined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted and almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that rutine, but disordered, mangled, and filthy spotted: yet the same doth in some part appear in the Elect, in so much as they are regenerate, and shall obtain her full brightness in heaven. But that we may know what parts it consists of, it shall be good to entreat of the powers of the soul. For that speculative duitive of Augustine is not found, where he saith, that the soul is a glass of the Trinitie, because that there is in it understanding, will, & memory. Neither is their opinion to be approved, which set the image of God in the power of dominion given unto him, as if he resembled God only in this, that he is appointed Lord and possessor of all things, whereas indeed the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soul.

5 But before I go any further, it is needful that I meet with the doting error of the Maniches, which Serveto hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is said, that God breathed the bread of life into the face of man, they thought that the soul did convey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immaterial God were come into man. But it is evident even shortly to shew how many gross and soul absurdities this diuellish error draweth with it. For if the soul be by derivation part of the essence of God, it shall follow that the nature of God is subject, not only to change and passions, but also to ignorance, vixill lustes, weakness, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do overs and diversely drown his soul, oftentimes he is blind by ignorance, oft he yeeldeth as vanquithed even to small temptations, and we know that the soul itself is the receiver of all things, al which things we must attribute to the nature of God, if we grant that the soul is of the essence of God, or a secret inflowing of Godhead. Who would not abhorre this monstrous dicide? Truly, indeed doth Paul allege out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God, but in quality not in substance, insomuch as he hath garnished vs with godly gifts. But in the meantime, to reare in under the essence of the Creator, as to say, that every man doth possess a part of it, is too much madness. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the souls, although the image of God be graven in them, were no litle created than the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirit of man came from God, and in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forsworn to be said, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also of Vandal, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an ungodly error, not acknowledging the image of God to be in man without his essential justice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirit could not make vs like unto himselfe, vnlike Christ should substantially pour himselfe into vs. With whatsoever colour many do go about to disguise these deccites, yet shall they never so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wits, but that they will easily see that these things fauour of the Maniches error. And where saith Paul, entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like form to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glory of Christ, we are transformed into the same image, as by the Spirit of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs not of one substance with God.

6 It was but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soul, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immaterial substance. In deed some other also, that is the Socratians, do touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach that to other, which himselfe was not persuaded. But therefore is Plato of the better judgement, because he doth in the soul consider the image of God. Some other do to bind the powers and vertues of the soul to this present life, that being being out of the body they leave to it nothing. Now we have already taught by the Scripture, that it is a bodiless substance: now must we add, that although properly it is not comprehendible in place, yet is it set in the body, and doth there dwell as in a house, not only to minister life to all the parts of the body, and to make the instruments thereof meete and fitly serving for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to beare the chiefes office in governing the life of man, and that not onely about the duties in this earthly life, but also to bring vs vp to the service of God. Although this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceived, yet even in the vices themselves there remaine imprinted some leauings thereof. For whence commeth it but of shame, that men have so great care what be reported of them? And whence commeth shame, but of regard of honetie? Whereof the beginning and cause is, that they understand that they are naturally borne to obtaine lustice, in which preservation is enclosed the seede of religion. For as without all controuersie man was made to meditation of the heavenly life: so is it certain, that the knowledge thereof was engraven in his soule. And surely man should want the principal use of his understanding, if he should be ignorant of his owne felicitie, whereof the perfection is, that he be yned with God, and therefore it is the chiefes action of the soule to aspire thercunto. And so the more that every man studied to approach vs God, the more he thereby proneth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them that would have divers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, and a reasonable soule, although they feeme to say somewhat by reason proveable, yet because there is no stedfast certaintie in their reasons, we will reiect them, yea we lifted to accomber our felues in things trifling and unprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betweene the instrumental motions & the part of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it selfe did not also differ from it selfe, and some specifie of it doe true with other some, as they were armes of enemies. But for such as that trouble some to procedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, that there are two soules, because the powers of the soule doe not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more subtle disputations of the powers themselfes, I leave that to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice vs for edification of godlynesse. I grant that the things that they teach are true, and not onely pleasant but also profitable to be known, and well gathered of them, and I forbide not such as are desirous to leerne to study them. First therefore I admit that there are five senses, which Plato better liked to call instruments, whereby all obiectes are powered into Common sense, as into a place of receit: then followeth Phaunias, which judgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath concieved, next is Reason, to which belongeth the vniuersall judgement of things: last, is the Understanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse upon, and consider. And to the Understanding minde, Reason and Phaunias, which are the three powers of the soule, that rest in knowledge, there doe answer three other that doe rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the parts whereof are to couer those things that the Understanding minde and Reason doe lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Phaunias do minifter unto it. The power of Defiring, which taketh holde of those things that Phaunias and Sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I feare that they shall more entangle vs with obscuritie, than further vs, I think it best to ouerpass them. If any man lift otherwise to divide the powers of the soule, and to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason is life, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meanes directed, and to call the other the power of Understanding, which is by it selfe patraker of Reason, I am not much against it: neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Understanding, and Appetite. But let vs rather choose a diuision, that that is within the capacity of all men, which cannot be had of the Philosophers. For they when they mean to speak most plainly, do divide the soul into Appetite and Understanding, but either of these they make of two sorts. Understanding, they say, is sometimes contemplative, which being contented with only knowledge, hath no moving of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Sometimes they say it is practical, which by conceiving of good or evil doth dierly move the will. And appetite they do divide into Will and Lust. Will they call that, when Appetite which they call homoeobath to reason, and Lust they call that, when the appetite shalke out of the yoke of reason, runneth out to imaction. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, whereby man may rightly govern himself.

But we are constrained somewhat to swerve from this manner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of man, nature, which came for punishment of his fall, do wrongfully confound the two very divers states of man. Let us therefore thus thinke of it, that there are in the soul of man two parts, which shall serve at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Understanding and Will. And let it be the office of Understanding to discern between objects, or things, before it, as each of them shall seeme worthy to be liked or disliked: and the office of Will, to choose and follow that which understanding saith to be good, & to refuse and flie that which understanding saith to disallow. Let vs not here be flated at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotile, that the mind hath of it selfe no moving, but that it is choice which moveth it, which choice he calleth the defining understanding. But to the end we be not intangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice us, that the Understanding is as it were the guide and governor of the soul, and that Will hath always regard to the appointment of Understanding, and abideth the judgement thereof in her desires. According whereunto, Aristotile himselfe hath truly said, that fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the understanding mind is affirming and denying. Now howe certaine the government of Understanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in another place. Here we meane only to shew that there can be found no power in the soul but that may well be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this for under Vnderstanding we comprehend Sense, which other do so divell of, that they say Sense is inclined to pleasure, for which Understanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to pass, that the appetite of Sense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of Understanding is Will. Again, in stead of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly used.

8 God therefore hath furnished the soul of man with an understanding minde, whereby he might discern good from evil, and right from wrong, and havine the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers have called this directing part the Guiders. To this he hath adiomed Will, to which belongeth choice. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not only had enough of reason, understanding, wisdom, and judgement, for the government of this earthly life, but also to clime vp even to God and to eternal felicite. Then to have choice added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, and order all the instrumentall motions, and that to the Will might be altogether agreeable to the government of reason. In this integritie, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might have attained eternal life. For here it is out of place to move question of the secret predetermination of God: because we are not now about to discourse what might have chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might have stood if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not given him constancie to continue, therefore he so easily fell. Yet his choice choise of good and cuill was free. And not that onely, but also in his understanding, minde, and in his will was most great uprightnesse, and all his instrumentall parts orderly framed to obedience, vntill by destroying himself he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, that in a mine they sought for an upright building, and for stronge souls in an unvjoynted ouetherow. This principle they held, that man could not be a living creature, endued with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good and cuill: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away between virtues and vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his owne aduise. Thus farre had they said well if there had beene no change in man, which change because they knew not of, it is no maruell though they confound heauen and earth togethers. But as for them which professing themselves to be the discipiles of Christ, do yet seeke for free will in man, that hath bin lost & drowned in spiritual destruction, they in going meanes betweene the Philosophers opinions and heauenly doctrine are plainly deceived, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we have to hold in minde, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posteritie ever since, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him receiued an infection derived to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the parts of his soule were frame to right order, then floude safe the soundness of his understanding minde, and his will free to choose the good. If any do object that it floude but in slippery state, because his power was but weak, I answeare that that state was yet such as sufficeth to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraine God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not inyne at all. I grant such a nature had beene better, but therefore precisly to quarrell with God, as though it had bin his dutie to have gotten that vnto man, is too much vniustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choise to giue how much pleased him. But why he did not uphold him with the strength ofstedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secret counsell: it is our part onely to be so farre wise as with soberie we may. Man received in deede to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. For of this will should have followed stedfast continuance. Yet is he not excusable, which receiued so much that of his owne will he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compell God to giue him any other than a meane wil and a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glory.

That God by his power doth nourish and mainaint the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his providence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.

But it were vrie fond and bare to make God a creatour for a moment, which doth nothing since he hath once made an end of his worke. And in this point principally ought we to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no leste in the continuall state of the world, than in the first beginning of it. For though the minds of the vriest wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth, are compelled to se vnto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar manner by it selfe, whereby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore verueth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleaged, that we do not understande but by faith, that the worlde was made by the worde of God. For vnlesse wee paaffe forwarde even vnto his prouidence, wee doe not yet rightlie conceive what this meaneth, that GOD is the Creatour, howiuer wee doe seeme to comprehende it in minde, and confesse it with toong. When the Men naturally by sense are brough to confesse God the Creatour, we by faith acknowledge him to be the go- vernor, not in ge- neral of the world, but of every particular thing in the world.

Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the very creation, it rests there, and when it proceed eth forthwith of all, it doth nothing but wey and consider the wisedome, power, and goodnesse of the workeman in making such a piece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thrust themselves in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine general doing in preserving and governing the same, upon which dependeth the power of mowing. Finally it thinketh that the lucely force at the beginning put into all things by God, doth suffice to sustaine them. But faith ought to pierce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall government and preserver of them: and that not by stirring with an universal motion as well the whole frame of the world, as all the parts thereof, but by susteyning, cherishing and curing, with singular prudence eniere one of those things that he hath created even to the leaft sparowe. So David after he had first saide that the world was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his providence. By the word of the Lord (against he) the heauens were established, and all the power thereof by the spirit of his mouth. By and by he addeth. The Lord looked downe upon the fortunes of men, and so the rest that the faith farther to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason to orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleaued, that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse he were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earnestly beleue that God made the world, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his works: therefore not without cause David doth by good order conuay vs from the one to the other. Generally in deed both the Philosophers do teach, and mens minds do conuay that all parts of the world are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they atteine not so farre as David both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth the godly with him, saying all things waite vpon thee, that thou maist gue them foode in due season. Thou guest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hand and they are filled with good things. But if thou hidde thy face they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Again, if thou send foorth thy spirite, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the sayeing of Paul, that we haue our being and are moued, and do live in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of God's special care whereby alone his fatherly favoure is known.

To God when we ascribe the works of his prudence unto fortune, as also when we speake of nature working without the hand of God guiding her in every worke.

2. That this difference may the better appeere, it is to be known, that the prudence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in companion set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by adventure. Nowe forasmuch as it hath beene commonly beleued in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to have beene beleued concerning Prudence, is by that wrong opinion not alone darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among thees or wilde beasts, if by wind sodainly rising he suffer shipwrecke on the sea, if hee be killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if another wandering in desert places finde remedy for his ponerie, if hauing beene tossed with the waues, he attaine to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperous as of aduerfitie the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But Whosoever be taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the haires of his head are numbered, will seek for a cause further off, and will firmly beleue that all chaunces are governed by the secret counsel of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them haue his owne properie naturalie put into it, yet doe they not put forth their power but only so farre as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments, whereby whereby God continually pouereth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more marvellous or more glorious than of the sunne. For besides that it giveth light to the whole world with his brightness, howe great a thing is this that he cherisheth and quickeneth all living creatures with his heat? that he breetheth fruitfulness into the earth with his beams? that out of seedes warmed in the bosome of the ground, he draweth a budding greennesse, and sufteining the same with new nourishments doth encrease and strenghten it, till it rieth vp in stalkes? That he feedeth it with continuall vapour till it groweth to a flower, and from a flower to fruite? That then also with baking it, he bringeth it to ripenes? That trees likewise & vines being warmed by him, do first bud & shooote forth branches; and after send out a flower, and of a flower do engender fruite? But the Lord, because he would claime the whole glorie of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to be, and the earth to bee furnished with all kinds of heards & fruite before that he created the Sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the Sunne to be either a principall or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of the Sunne, but onely an instrument which God wifeth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leave it and do all things as easily by himselfe. Then when we read that the sunne doothe still two daies in one degree at the prair of Iesu, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezchias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the Sunne doth not daile so rise and go downe by blinde instinct of nature, but that he to enue the remembrance of his fatherly favoure towards vs, doth gouerne the course thereof. Nothing is more natural then spring tide to come immediately after winter, Sommer after spring, and hauest in course after Summer. But in this orderly course is plainly scene so great & so vnequilall durents, that it may easly appeare that every yeere, moneth and day, is gouerned by a new and speciall providence of God.

3 And truely God doth claime and will have vs vsigne vnto him an almightines, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleepynge, but waking, effectuall, working and bulled in continuall doing. Nor such a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if he would command a river to flowe by his appointed chanel, but such a one as is bent and readie at all his particular mounings. For he is therefore called almighty, not because he can doe and yet sitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct onely continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but because he gouerning both heauen and earth by his providence so ordereth all things that nothing chanceeth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalm, that he doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine & determined will. For it were very fond to expound the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doorer, because he is the beginning and cause of all mounings: whereas the faithfull ought rather in aduertisement to safe themselves with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandement of God, because they are vnder his hand. If then the gouernement of God do so extende to all his works, it is a very childish chauvination to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more deuise God of his glory than themselves of a most profitable doctrine, whosoervr doth enure the prouidence of God within so narrow boundes, as if he suffered all things to be caried with an ungouerned course, according to a perpetual laye of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if he should be left subject to curious motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth, & the waters. Beside that by that meant the singular goodnes of God towards every man is too much vnhonourably diminished. David crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers brusts are eloquent enough to magnifie the glorie of God, because even so soon as they be come out of the wombe, Phil.8.3; they finde food prepared for them by his heavenly care. This is in deedc generally true, They which do not acknowledge that God direceth the working of euerie particular thing, does not onely rob him of his honour, but themselves of a double benefite, hope of god, things, and deliverance from fears of evill. lsa.115.3.

Text in the image is a page from a book discussing the creation and the role of God in the universe, emphasizing the unique and almighty nature of God's creation. The text is written in a historical context, reflecting the philosophical and religious understandings of the time. The passage describes how God's creation is orderly and governed by his providence, contrasting this with the chaotic nature of nature alone. It highlights the unique role of God in the creation, asserting that God's power and authority are evident in the natural world, and that this world is governed by God's wisdom and purpose. The text also touches on the concept of almightiness and the idea that everything in the universe is under God's control and guidance.
true, so that yet our cies and senses overpasse not that unmarkd which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers have full and plentiful breedes, some other almoft die, as it pleareth God to feede one more liberally, and another more scarcely. But they which give the due praise to the alnightynesse of God, doe receive double profe thereby, the one that he hath sufficiently large ability to doe them good, in whose possession are both heauen and earth, and to whose becke all creatures doe attend upon; to yeeld themselues to his obedience: the other that they may saffely rest in his protection, to whose will are subject all those hurtfull things that may any way be feared, by whose authoritie as with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his fiuries and all his preparation, vpon whose backe doth hang all that euer is against our safetie. And no other way but this can the inmeasurable and superstitions fears be corrected or appealed, which we oftentimes conceiue by dangers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearfull I say we bee, if where creatures doe threaten us or give vs any cause of fear, we be so afraid thereof, as if they had of themselues any force or power to doe vs harme, or did vnforesee one or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against the hurtes that they doe, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they should not feare the staries and signes of the heauen, as the vnbeleuers are wont to doe. He condemneth not every kinde of fear. But when the vnbeleuers to gue away the government of the world from God vnto Planets, doe faine that their felicitie or miferie doth hang on the decrees and forshawings of the staries, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe, that their fear is withdrawn away from that only one, whom they ought to have regarded, vnto the staries and comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this unfaithfulness, let him keepe alwaies in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are governed by the secret counsell of God, so that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both willing and willing it so to be.

4 First therefore let the readers learne, that prouidence is called that, nowhere with God idly beholdeth from heauen what is done in the worlde, but wherewith as guiding the sterne he feteth and ordereth all things that come to passe. So doth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his cies. For when Abraham saide vnto his sonne, God shall provide, he meant not onely, that God did foreknowe the successe them to come, but that he did causeth the care of a thing to him unknouen vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certaine ende. Whereby followeth, that prouidence consisteth in doing: for too much fondly doe many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether to gresse which gue vnto God a government but disordered, and without advised choice, (as I haue before saide,) that is to say, such as whilome and driueth about with a generall motion the frame of the worlde with all the partes thereof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithstanding this prouidence which they call vniterfall) that all creatures may be mooved by chaunce, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choice of his will. And so doe they part the governement between God and man, that God by his power inspight into man motion whereby he may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefely they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themselues are governed by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicurians (which pestilence the world hath alwaies been filled with) which dreame of an idle and slothfull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the aire, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For against so evident madnesse, the dumme creatures themselves doe sufficiently erie out. For, now my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleued, which givin to God a certaine blind, and I wot not what for a certaine motion, taketh from him the principal thing, that is, by his incomprehensible wisdom to direct and dispose all things to their end: and so in name only and not in deed it maketh God ruler of the world, because it taketh from him the government of it. For what (I beseech you) is it else to govern, but so to be over them that are vnder thee, that thou mayest rule them by appointed order? Yet do I not altogether reiect that which is spoken of the vniuersall providence: so that they will againe grant me this, that the world is ruled by God, not only because he maintaineth the order of nature which himself hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of every one of his works. True it is, that all sorts of things are moved by a secret instinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternal commandement of God, and that which God hath once determined doth of itself proceede forwards. And hereunto may that be applied which Christ teacheth, that he and his Father were euen from the beginning alwaies working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him we live, are moued and have our being, and that which the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, meaning to prooue the Godhead of Christ, faith, that by his mightie commandement all things are sustained. But they do wrong which by this colour do hide and darken the speciall providence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is manuell that any man could doubt of it. And surely they themselves that draw the same vellic which I speake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they do wrongfully restrain the same only to peculiar doings. Wherefore we muſt prooue that God doth fo glue heed to the government of the successes of all things, and that they all do proceede from his determinate counsell, that nothing happeneth by chance.

5. If we grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselves or by chance carried whether the inclination of nature driueth them, the mutual succeding by turnes of daies and nights, of Winter and Summer, shall be the worke of God, insomuch as hee appointing to euerie one their duties, hath set them a certaine law, that is, if they should alwaye keepe one measure in equal proportion, as well the daies that come after the nights, the months after moneths, yeeres after yeeres. But when sometimes immoderate heates with drines do burne vp all the graine, sometime vnseasonable raines doe marre the corn, when sudden harme commeth by haile & tempests: that shall not be the worke of God, vnderlie perhaps it be cause the clouds or faire weather, or cold or heat have their beginning of the meeting of the planets or other naturall cauſes. But by this meanes is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly favour, nor for the judgements of God. If they say that God is sufficient enough to mankinde because he powreth into the heauen and earth an ordinarie power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an intention, as though the fruitfulness of one yeere were not the singular blessing of God, and death and famine were not his curse & vengeance. But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritie of God himselfe suffice vs. In the Lawe and in the Prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with dewe and raine, he declareth his favour; and that when by his commandement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corn is consumed with blasting and other harnes, when the fieldes are struck with haile and tempests, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we grant these things, then is it affirmed that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commandement of God. David praiseth the generall providence of God, that hee giueth meate to the Rauns birds that call vpon him: but when God himselfe threateneth famine to liuing creatures, doth doth he not sufficiently declare that he feedeth all living things sometime with scarce, and sometime with more plentiful portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restrain this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparrow of none so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confess with the Prophet, that he doth dwell on him, that yet he humbleth himself to look upon all things that chance in heaven and earth.

But because we know that the world was made principally for mankind's sake, we must therefore consider this end in the government of man. The Prophet Hieremias cried out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his own, neither belongeth it to man to direct his own steps. And Solomon faith, the steps of man are ruled by the Lord, and how shall a man dispose his own way? Now let them say that man is moved by God according to the inclination of his own nature, but that man himself doth turneth that turning whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truly said, then should man have the free choice of his own ways. Peradventure they will deny it, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But see if it is certain that the Prophet and Solomon do give unto God, not only power but also choice and appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Solomon in another place doth finely rebuke this rashness of men, that appointeth themselves another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparations (God he) of the hart are in man, but the answer of the toong is of the Lord. It is a fond madneffe that men will take upon them to do things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what he will. And the scripture to express more plainly that nothing at all is done in the world but by his appointment, the weth that those things which seem most happening by chance are subject to him. For what can you more ascribe to chance, then when a broken bough falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lord faith far otherwife, which confesseth that he hath delivered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doth not leave the happening of lots to the blindnesse of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimeth the judgement of themselves: for he faith that it is commeth not to pass by a man's owne power that stones are cast into the lap and drawn out againe, but that thing that onely might be faide to come of chance he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that sayling of Solomon. The poor man and the richer meet together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men and rich be mangled together in the world, while every one hath his state asigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which gueth light to all men is not blind, and so he exhorteeth the poore to patience, because who so ever are not contented with their own state, they seek to shake off the burden that God hath laid upon them. So another Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lye in merie & some arise vp to honor. To come to preferment is neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South, for God is the judge, he maketh low and he maketh high. Because God cannot put off the office of a judge, thereupon the Prophet prouepeth that by his secret purpose, some are in honor, and other some remaine in contempt.

And also I say that the very particular successes are generally witnessse of God's singular prudence. God raised in the desert a south wind to bring the people plente of fowles; when his pleasure was to have Jonas thrown into the sea, he sent out a wind to raise vp a tempest. But they that thinke that God governeth not the world, will say that this chance was beside common use. But thereby I do gather that sooner any wind doth rise or increase but by the speciall commandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, that he maketh the winde his messengers, and fierie flames his minifters, that he maketh the cloudes his chariots, and rideth upon the wings of the windes, vnleffe he did by his will driue about the cloudes and windes, and they in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place we are taught that so oft as the sea swelleth with blast of windes, those violences doe testify a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth vp the stormie windes and Ichitheth vp the waues thereof, and then he turneth them to calme, so that the waues thereof are still. As in another place he faith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendring is naturally giften to men, yet God willeth it to be imparted to his speciall grace, that he teacheth some in bareness, and vouchefaeth to grant such to other some, the fruit of the wombbe is his gift. Therefore said Jacob to his wife, am I as God that I can give thee children? But to make an end; there is nothing more ordinary in nature, that we be fed with bread. But the Holy Ghoft pronounceth, that not onely the growing of the fruittes of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men be nourished by onely bread, because it is not the very full feeding, that nourisheth, but the secret blessing of God: as on the other side he threateneth, that he will breake the stay of bread. Neither could we earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnleffe God did give vs foode with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to perswade the faithful, that God in feeding them doth fulfill the office of a good father of househould, doth put them in minde, that the giueth meate to all flesh. Finally when we have on the one side: The eies of the Lorde are upon the righteous, and his carets bent to their prayers; on the other side: The eies of the Lord is upon the vngodly, to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: Let vs knowe that all creatures both above and beneath are ready to obedience, that he may apply them to what vs focuer he will, whereupon is gathered, that not onely his general providence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his maruellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper end.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, doe caull that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fateum or Deftinie, which also was once liade for reproach to Augustine. As for vs, although we be loth to trieue about wordees, yet we allow not this word Fateum, both because it is one of those whose prophane noueltie Saint Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men doe goe about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully liade to our charge. For we doe not as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causses which is contained in nature: but we make God the judge and gouernour of all things, which according to his wisdome hath curen from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he would doe, and now by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Whereupon we affirme that not onely the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposis and wills of men are so governed by his Providence, that they be directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then will one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I answere that Basilius Magnvs hath truly faide that fortune and chaunce are heathen mens wordes, with the signification whereof of the minde of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if every good success be the blessing of God, and every calamite and adueritie be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for fortune or chaunce. We ought also to be moued with this sayeing of Augustine. In his booke against the Academites he faith: It doth displease me that I hauie so oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant thereby, but onely a chaunceable happening in outward thungs either good or euill. Of which worde Fortune are defined those words which no religion forbideth vs to vs, fortuna, fortran, fortauus, fortuitus, those is, perhaps, perdveuntur, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet must all be applied to the providence of God. And that did I not leaue vnspeaken when
Of the knowledge of fortune.

I said, for perchance even the same that is commonly called fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in things nothing else, but that whereof the reason and cause is unknown. I said this in deed, but it repenteth me that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men have a very will custome, that where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased Fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in his books teach, that the world should be vndorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, and partly by the providence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subiect vnto and ruled by providence, taking this for a priciple, that nothing is more against conuenience of reason, than to say, that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for else it shoult happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hanger upon the will of men: and by and by after he plaineth faith that we ought not to seeke a cause of the will of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be vnderstended, shal very well appeare by one place where he prooueth that the will of God is the foundef and first cause of all things, because nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely he faineth not God doth not sit still idle in a watch tower, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he saith an actual will (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

A thing may be termed chansable, and be saide to happen by fortune in respect of us, who se not the cause, when in respect of God who hath appointed it, is a necessarie, and though not in it owne nature, yet by reason of his appointment inceivable.

But for as much as the dulnesse of our vnderstanding cannot by a great way attaine to the height of Gods providence, we must vse a distinction to helpe to lift it vp. I say therefore, howsoever all things are ordered by the purpofe and certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chansable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world and men, and vnaudiously roseth all things vp and downe (for such beautiness ought to be far from a Christian hart) but because the order, meane end, and necesse of those things that happen, doth for the most part lie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chansable, which yet it is certaine to come to paffe by the will of God. For they seeme no otherwise, whether we consider them in their owne nature, or whether we estimate them according to our knowledge and judgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, that a marshall being entred into a wood or company of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his fellows, and in his wandering chanceth upon a den of robbers, lighteth among thewes, and is killed, his death was not onely forseen with Gods eie, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre each mans life should extend, but that he hath set and appointed markes which cannot be paffe. And yet so farre as the capaciteit of our minde conceiueth, all things herein seeme happening by chancie. What shall a Christian here thinke? evne this, whatsoever happened in such a death, he will thinke it in nature chancie by fortune as it is in deed, yet he will not doubt that the providence of God did governe to direct fortune to her end. In like maner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are uncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remained setted in our harts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath already foreseen. In this meaning is the name of chance oft repeated in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men doe not attaine to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret providence of God, was never so blotted out of the harts of men, but that even in the darknesse thereof may shined some sparks thereof. So the souldiers of the Philistians, although they waier in doubtfulness, yet they ascribe aduenturistic partly to God, partly to fortune. (If saie they) the aike goth that way, we shall knowe that it is God that hath stricken vs: but if it go the other way, then a chance hath lightvpon vs. In deed.

Cap. 16.
God the Creator. Lib. 1. 49

Deed they did foolishly, when their cunning of soothsaying deceived them, to flee to fortune, but in the mean while we see them constrained, so that they dare not think that the evil hap which chanced unto them did come of fortune. But how God with the biddce of his providence turneth all successeth whether pleaseth him, may appear by one notable example. Behold even at one moment of time, when David was found out and secretly taken in the desert of Mahan, even then the Philistines invaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to provide for the safety of his servant did cast this let in Saul's way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sudden, and beside the expectation of men, yet may we not say that it came by chance. But those things that seem to vs to happen by chance, faith will acknowledge to have been a secret moving of God. I grant there doth not always appear the like reason, but undoubtedly we ought to believe, that whatsoever changes of things are seen in the world, they come by the secret stirring of the hand of God, But that which God purposeth is so of necessity to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessity precisely nor by the nature of it selfe. As there of is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a body like unto ours, no wise man will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet it was impossible that they should be broken: whereby we see againe that not without cause were in schools invented the distinctions of necessity in respect, and necessity absolute, of consequent and consequence, whereas God had subject to brickliness the bones of his son, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessity by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might have beene.

The xviij. Chapter.

Whereunto and to what end this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

Now forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious subtleties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encumber themselves with entangled doubts, who soever do not know the true and right rule of this doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly, to what end the Scripture teacheth, that all things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the providence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondly, that the same is in such sort the governor of all things, that sometime it worketh by means, sometime without means, and sometime against all means. Last of all, that it tendeth to this end, that God may shew that he hath care of mankind, but specially that he doth watch and ruleing of his Church, which he vouchsaft more nearly to looke vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly favour and bountifulness of God, or oftentimes the feuerite of his judgement do brightly appear in the whole course of his providence: yet sometime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our minde, that mens matters are turned & whirled about with the blind way of fortune, so that the fittest thirreth vs to murmure, as if God did to make himselfe pastime, to stifle them like tempeste bals. True it is, that if we were with quiet and still minds ready to learn, the very subtletie it selfe would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their evil affections and tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselves, or to awake their drvennesse: on the other side to overthrowe the proud, to disappoint the subtletie of the wicked, to confound their doubts. But howsoever the causes be secret and unknowen to vs, we must assurdeely holde that they are laid vp in

In hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to cry out with David, God, thou hast made thy wonderful works so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward us. I would declare and speak of them, but they are more than I am able to express. For although always in our miseries we ought to thinke upon our sins, that the very punishment may move us to repentance, yet do we see how Christ gueseth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish euerie one according to his deserving. For of him that was borne blinde he faith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glorie of God may be shewed in him. For here naturall sense murmureth when calamity commeth euen before birth, as if God did vmercifully so to punishe the filly innocent, that had not deserved it. But Christ doth teistle that in this looking glass the glorie of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue ecleere eies to behold it. But we must keepe modestie, that we draw not God to yeelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret judgements, that his will be vnto vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thick clouds do cover the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heady orftone mysticall eft is cast before our eies, and the thunder troubleth our eares, and all our senses are amazed with terror, we thinke that all things are confounded and troubled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietness and calmenesse: that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of things in the world taketh from vs ability to judge, God by the pure light of his righteoussesse and wisdome, doth in well framed order governe and dispose even those vice troublesome motions themselfes to a right end. And surelye very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the works of God to account and examine his secret meanings, and to give vnadvised sentence of things vnsnownen, than they will do of the deeds of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modeste towardes our egals, that we had rather suspend our judgment then to incur the blame of rashnes, and on the other side proudely to triumph vpon the daire judgements of God, which it became vs to regard with reuerence?

2. Therefore no man shall wel and profitably say the prudence of God, but he that considering that he hath to do with his creator & the maker of the world, doth with such humilitie as he ought submit himselfe to fear & reuerence. Hereby it commeth to passe, that so many dogs at this day do with venomed bitings, or at least barling, affaile this doctrine, because they will have no more to be lawfull for God, then their owne reason informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefullnes that they are able, for that not contented with the commandements of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsellors. As though the things that we teach were an intencion of oure owne braine, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth every where expressely say the same, and repeateth it with unnumbered forms of speech. But because some frame reframed them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen: they thinke that they can end with vs, to the ende they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not grant that what former happeneth in the world, is governed by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere, to what end the Scripture faith: that his judgements are a deep secrets depth. For whereas Moses cried out that the will of God is not to be bought a farre of in the clouds, or in the depths, because it is familiarly fet forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse depth. Of the which Paul also faith: O deapth of the riches and of the wisdome, and of the knowledge of God: how incomprehensible are his judgements, and his ways past finding out? for who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath beene his counsellor? And it is in deede true, that in the Gospel and in the law are contained mysteries which are far above the capacite of our sense: but for as much as God for the comprehending of these mysteries which he hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth light his the minde of them that is his, with the spirit of understanding: now is therein no bottomlesse depth, but a way where in we must take the walke, and a candle to guide our seate, and the light of life, and the school of certaine and plainly discernable truth. But his marvellous order of governing the world, is worthy called a bottomlesse depth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reverently to worship it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in few words. The secret things (faith he) belong to the Lord our God: but the things revealed belong to vs and to our children for ever. We see how he biddeth vs not only to study in meditation of the law, but also reverently to looke vp into the secret providence of God. And in the booke of Job is rehearsed one title of this depth, that it humbleth our minde. For after that the author of that booke in suucying vp and down the fame of the world, had honarably entreated of the works of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his warres, but how little a portion heare we of him? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisedome that remayneth with God, and the measure of wisedome that he hath appoynted for men. For after he hath preached of the secrets of nature, he faith that wisedome is known to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all liuing creatures. But by and by after, he faith further, that it is published to the ende it should be searched out, because it is fai'd vs man: behold, the seare of God is wisedome. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in onely good will we doe according to the law, because his providence is an unchangeable law. Therefore, fith God doth claime vs himselfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs unknowne, let this be to vs a law of soberneſse and modestie, quickly to obey his soueraine authority, that his will may be to vs the only rule of justice, and the most sure caufe of all things. I mean not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters doe babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his justice from his power, but I mean that providence, which is the gouernesse of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

3 Whosoever shall be framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past will murmur against God for their adversities, nor lay upon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the cause, but Jupiter and destiny; nor yet againe, as carried away with deceptions, they will by deperation throw their fleshes into destruction, as that young man in Plato which said: Visible is the chance of things: the Destinies drue men at their pleasure, I will get me to some rocke there to make an ende of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretend the name of God to couer their owne mischievous doings: for so faith Lyconides in another comedie; God was the murderer. I beleue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I know it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy Ghost, they may tranquile to attaine thereto. And also being ready to follow God, whether he called, they shew indeede that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Verie foolishly doe prophane men turmoile with their fondneſses, so that they in manner confound heauen and earth together as the saying is: If God have marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it: then it is labor vainely lost in taking heed to our selves. Therefore, whereas one man dareth not venture to goe the way that he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murthered of theeues: another sendeth for Physicians, and weareth himselfe with medicines to succour his life: another forbeareth grosse meates for fear of apparing his feele health: another dreadeth to dwell...
Cap. 17. Of the knowledge of

in a ruinous house. Finally, whereas men devise alwayes and endeavour with all diligence of mind whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or else life and death, health and sickness, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they court or hate them, doe by their travaile endeavour to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lord to provide for those things which he hath already decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy all counsels that men doe take for time to come as things against the providence of God, which hath determined what he would have done, without calling them to counsile. And then whatsoever is alreadie happened, they so impute it to the providence of God, that they wink at the man whom they know to have done it. As, hath a Russian slaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that it was forescene and ordained by the Lord, he is a minister of his providence. Hath the Sonne carelesly, neglecting all remedies, wayed for the death of his Father? he could not refit God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So al mischanceous doings they call virtues, because they obey the ordinance of God.

4. But as touching things to come,

Salomon doth well bring in accordance together, the purposes of men with the providence of God. For as he laugheth to come their folly, which boldly doe enterpryse anything without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hand: so in another place he speaketh in this manner: The hart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steps, meaning that we are not hindered by the eternall Decrees of God, but that under his will we may both provide for our selves, and dispose all things belonging to vs. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limited our life within appointed bounds, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with means and helps to preserve it, hath made vs to have knowledge before hande of dangers, and that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath given us provisions and remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our dutie, that is to say: If God hath committed to us our owne life to defende, our dutie is to defend it. If he offer vs helps, our dutie is to use them. If he shew vs dangers before, our dutie is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our dutie is not to neglect them. But no danger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fatal, which by all remedies cannot be overcome. But what if dangers be therefore not fatal, because God hath assigned the remedies to repulse and overcome them. See how thy maner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that danger is not to be taken heed of, because forasmuch as it is not fatal, we shall escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore ensayme thee to take heed of it, because he will not have it fatal unto thee. These made men doe not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counsell and heede is inspired into men by God, whereby they may serve his providence in preferring of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence and sloth they procure to themselves these evils that he hath appointed for them. For how commeth it to passe, that a circumstancie man while he prouideth for himselfe, doth wind himselfe out of evils that hang over him, and the poore peritheth by vnadvised rashnes, but for that both folly and wife-dome are the instruments of Gods disposition on both parts? Therefore it pleased God to hide from vs all things to come, to this end that we should meete with them as things doubtfull, and not cease to set prepared remedies against them, till either they be overcome, or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished, that the Providence of God doth not alwayes shew it selfe naked, but as God God by vlying of meanes doth in a certaine manner cloth it.

5 The same men doe vnoorderly and vnaudefully draw the chances of time past to the naked prudence of God. For because upon it doth hang all things whatsoever happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor murthers, are committed without the will of God. Why then (say they) shall a thefe be punished, for that he spoyled him whom the Lords will was to punnish with poverty? Why shall the murtherer be punished which hath blame him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe ferue the will of God, why shall they be punished? But I deny that they ferue the will of God. For we may not say, that he which is carried with an euill minde doth service vnto God as commander of it, where indeed he doth but obey his owne wicked luft. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doth labor to that ende, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doing of things we must see that same will of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs only that which he commandeth. If we doe anything against his commandement, it is not obedience but obstaracie and trespassion. But vnlesse he would, we shou'd not doe it. I grant. But doe we euill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not commande vse to doethem, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he will eth, but soaring with the intemperance of our owne luft, that of fet purpose we bende our travaile against him. And by these meanes in euill doing we ferue his owne ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnes of his wisdome he hath good skill to vse euill instruments to doe good. And see how foolish is their maner of arguing. They would have the doers unpunished for mifchievous acts, because they are not committed but by the disposition of God. I grant more: that theeues and murtherers and other euill doers are the instruments of Gods prudence, whom the Lord doth vse to execute those judgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to have any excuse thereby. For why? shal they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shall they couer their naughtines and with his righconues? They can doe neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselves, they are accused by their owne conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they finde all the euill in themselues, and in him nothing but a lawfull vse of their euilkness. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the sinke in a dead carion, which hath beene both rotted and disclosed by heat of the sunne? All men doe see that it is raisd by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doth therefore say, that the sunbeames doe sinke. So when there refeth in an euill man, the matter and guiltinesse of euill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vse their seruice at his pleasure? Away therefore with this duggish foreswardness, which may indeede a farre off barke at the justice of God, but cannot touch it.

6 But these caullations or rather doting eaires of phrentike men, shall easilie be shaken away, by godly and holy meditation of the prudence, which the rule of godlinesse teacheth vs, so that thereof may grow vnto vs a good and most pleasant fruit. Therefore a Christian hart when it is most assuredly perswaded that all things come to pase by the disposition of God, and that nothing happeneth by chance, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cause of things, and yet will consider the inferior causes in their place. Then he wil not doubt that the singular prudence of God doth watch for his preseruation, which prudence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shall turne to his good and valuation. And because he hath to doe first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will assure himselfe that Gods prudence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that all their counsels, vils, enterprizes and powers

powers are under the hand of God, so that it is in Gods will to bow them whether he lift, and to restrain them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular providence of God doth keep watch for the safety of the faithful, there are many and most evident promises to witness. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall nourish thee, and shall not suffer the righteous to fall for ever, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the help of the highest, shall abide in the protection of the God of heaven. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I will be thy shield, a brazen wall: I will be enmy to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principal entry in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with such diligence keep the waies of the Saints, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore as a little before we have right fully rejected their opinion which do imagine an universal providence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care ofuerie creature: yet principally it shall be good to reknowledge the same special care toward our felues. Wherupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparow of least value, doth fall to the ground without the will of the Father, doth by & by apply it to this end, that we should consider that how much we be more worth than sparrows, with so much more care doth God provide for vs, and he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to trust that the hares of our head are numbered. What can we with our felues more, if not so much as a haire can fall from our head but by his will? I speake not only of all mankund, but because God hath chosen his church for a dwelling house for himself, it is no doubt but that he doth by singular examples shew his care in governing of it.

7 The servant of God being strengthened with these both, promises and examples, will joine with them the testimonies which teach that all men are under Gods power, whether it be to winne their minds to good will, or to restrain their malice that it may do no hurt. For it is the Lord that giveth vs favour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the maliciousneffe of our enemies, he knoweth how by divers waies to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their witte from them, so that they can conceiue no sound or sober advise, like as he sent forth Saito to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceive Achab. He made Rechabeam made by the young mens counsel, that he might be spoiled of his kingdom by his owne folly. Many times when he grauneth them wit, yet he maketh them to afraid and astonished, that they cannot will or go about that which they have conceived. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to go about that which lust and rage did counsel them, he doth in convenient time breake off their violations, and suffereth them not to proccede to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achiabaph that should have bene to Davids destruction. So also he taketh care to govern all his creatures for the benefit and satisfaction of them that be his, yea, and to governe the diuell himself, which as we fee duret enterprize nothing against Job without his sufferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarily enueth both a thankfulness of minde in prosperous success of things, and also patience in adversitie, and an incredible assurance against the time to come. Whatsoever therefore shall befall unto him prosperously and according to his harts desire, all that he shall abstract unto God, whether he feel the bountie of God by the minifterie of men, or be holpen by heuedle creatures. For thus he will think in his minde: Surely it is the Lord which hath inclined their minds to me, which hath joyned them unto me to be instruments of his goodnes towards me. In plentie of the fruits of the earth, thus he will think, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare his fruits. In other things he will not doubt that it is the only blessing of the Lord, whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes he will not abide to be unthankfull.
8. If any adueritie happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his mind to God, whose hand auaileth much to imprin't in vs a patience and quiet moderation of hart. If Joeph had still continued in recording the falsehoods of his brethren, he could neuer have taken a brothenly minde toward them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lord, he forgave the inuirie, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farre forth that of his owne accord he comforted his brethren and said: It is not you that souled me into Egypt, but by the will of God was sent before you to save your lustes. You indeed thought cuill of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iub had had respect to the Chaldseers, by whom he was troubled, he would southe forth have beene kindled to revenge. But because he did therewithall acknowledge it to be the wooke of God, he comforted himselfe with this moft excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So Dauid: when Semei had raied and cast stones at him, if he had looked upon man, he would have encouraged his souldiers to reaceque the inuirie. But because he understood that Semei did it not without the moving of the Lord, he rather appeased them. Let him alone (faide he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse. With the same bridelle in another place doth he restraine the intemperance of sorrow. I held my peace (faith he) and became as durnbe, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectuall remedie against wrath and impatience: surely he hath not a little profire which hath learned in this behalfe to thynke vpon the providence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to struie against it, but also because he willeth nothing but that which is both iuft and expedient. In summe this is the ende, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leaving their malice (which would doe nothing but enforce our sorrow, and what our minds to revenge) should remember to clime vp vnto God, and learne to beleue assuredly, that whatsoever our enemie hath mischeiuously done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to restraine vs from recompending of injuries doth wisely put vs in minde, that we are not to wrasffe with flesh and blood, but with the spirituall enemie the Diuell, that we may prepare our selves to struie with him. But this is the moft profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the Diuell as all wicked men to struie with vs, and that he fitteth as Judge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that oppresse vs, doe chance without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the Law: whatsoever is prosperous floweth from the fountain of Gods blessing, and that all adueritie are his curings: and let that most terrible warning make vs afraid: If ye walke stubbornly against me, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our fuggifhenesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chance that happeneth of both sortes, we are neither encouraged by the benefices of God to worship him nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This fame is the reason, why Hieremie and Amos did so sharply rebuke the Jews, because they thought that things as well good as cuill came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose liueth that sermon of Efay, I the God that create light, and fashion darknesse, that make peace, and create cuill: I God doe make all these things.

9. And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither will he, because he thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whom he hath receiued benefite, therefore let them passe vnconsidered, as though they had defrued no thynke by their gentlenesse: but he will hartily thynke himselfe bound vnto them, and will willingly confess his bonde, and trauell as he shall be able, and as occasion shall serve, to recompence it. Finally in benefices receiued he will reuerence and praise God as the principlall Author, but hee will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is indeed he will understand that he is by the will of God bound to them, by whose hand it was God will to be beneficially brought him. If he suffer any loss by negligence or want of foresight, he will determine in his mind, that the same was done indeed with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himself. If any man be dead by fickness whom he hath negligently handled, whereas of duetie he should have taken good heed unto him, although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will he not thereby lese his office, but because he had not faithfully discharged his duetie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much less when there is vied any fraud, and conceited malice of minde in committing either murder or theft, will he excuse it vnder pretence of God's providence, but he will in one felse cuill actuallly behold both the righteousnes of God, & the wickednes of man, as both doth manifestly shew themselves. But principally in things to come he will have consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the help of men which he may vie for his faftetie. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsel, nor slothfull in craving their helpe whom he seeth to have sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vie as the lawfull instruments of Gods providence. And because he doth not certainly knowe what successe the busines he goeth about, (faung that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will provide for his benefite) he will with studie trauell to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, to ferre as he can conceive in minde and understanding. And yet in taking of counsell he will not be carried on by his owne wit, but will commit and yeld to himselfe to the wifedome of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not to stay vpon outward helpe, that if he haue them he will carelesly reft vpon them, or if he want them he will be aeraude as least defpicable, for he shall have his minde alway fastened vpon the Providence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawn away from the steadfast beholding thereof, by consideration of prefent things. So though 1sa. acknowledged that the successe of battell is in the will and hand of God, yet he gave not him selfe to slothfulnes but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaue it vnto the Lord to gourne the ende. We will stand valiant (faith he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his sies. This knowledge that depoyle vs of raisines and wrongfull confidence, and shall drive vs to continuall calling vpon God: and also shall uphold our minds with good hope, so as we may not doubt assuredly and boldely to despize those dangers that compass vs about.

In this point doth the inextinguishable feliciet of a godly minde shew sooth it selfe. Innumerable are the culls that doe beke men's life, and doth threaten them so many deaths. As, not to go further than our felicets : forasmuch as our bodie is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea, hath enclosed and doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not carry him selfe but he must needs also carie about with him many forms of his owne destruction, and drawe forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweate without peril? Now whither soever thou turne thee, all things that are about thee are not onely vntrustie friends to thee, but doe in maner openly threaten and seeme to shew thee present death. Go to into a ship, there is but a foote thicknes betweene thee and death. Sit on horsebacke, in the flipping of one foote thy life is in danger. Go through the streets of the citie: euen how many tyle are vpon the houres, to so many perils art thou subject. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. How many wilde beasts thou leeff, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meanest to flutter vp thy selfe, even in a garden well fown, where may appeare nothing but pleasantnesse of aire and ground, there somet ime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subject to fire, doeth in the day time threaten thee with poxerie, and in the night time with falling vp on thy head. Thy seedle, forasmuch as it lyeth open to haile, frost, drowth and other tempestes, it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisonings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part do be against vs at home, and part doe follow vs abroad. In these frights must not man needs be most miserable, which euen in life half dead doth plainly draw forth a carefull & fainting breath, as if he had a word of continually hanging over his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chance seldom, or at the least not always, nor to all men, and never all at once. I grant, but seeing we are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to our selves, and that our life ought of duece no more to be free from theirs, it cannot be but that we must dread and feare them as things that may light upon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearfulness? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproche of God to say, that he hath set open man the noblest of all his creatures to their blind and vauudised strokes of fortune. But here be my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which he should feel, if he should be brought subject under Fortunes dominion.

If but when that light of Gods Providence hath once shined upon a godly man: he is nowe releas'd and delitered not onely from the extreme anguith and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from all care. For as sute he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comfort to understand that the heavenly father doeth so holde in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authority and countenance, so ordereth them with his wisdom, that nothing befalles him but by his appointment: and that he is received into Gods tuition, and committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so far as it shall please God the governor to give them place. For if it was in the Psalm. For hee shall deliver thee from the hunters share, and from the noysome peblence. He will couer thee under his wings, and thou shalt be fre from under his feathers. His truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraide of the fear of the night, nor of the arrow that flyeth by day, nor of the peblence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence procedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glorie. The Lord is my helper, I will not be afraide whatso euer may doe to me. The Lord is my protector, why shal I be afraide? If whole camps flande vp against me, if I walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is never taken away from them? but hereby, that where the world is see meth in shew to be without order whirled about, they knowe that God worketh everie where, whose worke they truft shal be for their preseruation. Nowe if their safetie be assailed either by the diuell or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance and meditation of Providence, they must needs by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the diuell and all the rout of the wicked, are so euerie way holden in by the hande of God as with a bridde, that they cannot conceiue any mischief against vs, nor doe about it when they have conceiued it, nor if they doe never so much about it, can flirre one finger to bring it to passe, but so faire as he shall suffer, yea, so fare as he shall command, and that they are not onely holden fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridles to doe service: here haue they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselves. For as it is the Lordes worke to aume their furie and to turne and direct it whither it pleaseth him, C. p. 17. Of the knowledge of him, so is it his work also to appoint a measure and end, that they do not after their own will licentiously triumph. With which persuasion Paul being established, did by the sufficiency of God appoint his journey in another place which he faide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had solely saide that he had beene stopped by Satan, he should have seemed to give him too much power, as if it had beene in Satan's hande to overthowe the verie purposes of God: but when he maketh God the judge, upon whose suffiency all journeys do hang: he doth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoever he go about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doth Daniel, because for the sundrie changes wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were whirled about, he doth flee to this sanctuary, faith that his times are in the hande of God. He might have saide either the course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the worde Times, he meant to expresse that howsoever the state of man be vestid and whatsoever alterations do now and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cause saith, and the king of Israel, whenjoyning their powers to the destruction of Inda, they seemed as fire-brands kindled to wafte and consume the lande, are called by the Prophet smoking brands, which can doe nothing but breath out a little smoke. So when Zharas was terrible to all men by reason of his riches, strength and number of men, he himselfe is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God faith that hee will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither hee list. Finallie, because I will not carie long upon this point, if a man make it hee shall easely see that the extremity of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Providence, and the cheefe blisfilldeffe standeth in the knowledge thereof.

12. Concerning the Providence of God, this that is saide were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithful, (for to fill the vaine curiousitie of men nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wised that they be satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seeme to meane otherwise than is above declared, that God hath not steedfast and stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancement of Saul to the kingdome. And that hee will repent him of the cuill that hee had determined to laie upon his people, so soone as he perceived any conversion of heart. Againe, there are rehearsed divers repeales of his decrees. He had declared by Jonas to the Nimbistes, that after forty daies once past Nimbistes should be destroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Eile pronounced death to Egziu, which hee was moued by his teares and prayers to deferre. Hee upon manie do make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yeerely, daily, and hourlye appointeth this or that, as every mans deserings are, or as he thinketh it conietue and justice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to holde, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, error and weaknesse. For if no man do willingly and willingly throw himselfe into the caue that he needeth to repent, wee can not saie that God doth repent, but that wee must also saie, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot auaide it, or that he headlong and vnadvisedly runneth into a purpose whereof he by and by doth thinketh him. But that it is so faire from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the verie mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, that in the same Chapter they are both so joyned together, that the comparison doth verie well bring the sheepe of repugnancy to agreement. His changing is figuratively spoken, that God repenteth that he had made Saul king, by and by after it is added: The strength of Israel shall not be,

nor shall be mowed with repentance. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his unchangeable is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certain that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetual and above all repentance. And that his constancy should not be doubtful; his very adversaries have been compelled to bear witness. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not choose but burst out into this saying that he is not like a man to lie: nor as a sonne of man to be changed, and that it is not possible that he should not doe that he hath said, and not fulfill whatsoever he hath spoken.

13. What meaneth then this name of repentance? Even in the same sort that all the other phrases of speech which do describe God unto vs after the manner of men. For, because our weakness doth not reach to his highnesse, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed lowe to our capacitie, that we might understand it. And this is the manner how to frame it lowe for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceived of vs. Whereas he himselfe is without all mowing of a troubled minde, he yet teacheth us that he is angry with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angry, we are not to imagine that there is any mowing at all in him, but rather to consider that this speech is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angrie so oft as he exerciseth judgement; so ought we to understand nothing elze by this wordes of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes, are wont to declare that they mislike them. Because then eniere change among men is an amendment of that which misliketh them, and amendment commeth of repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God changeth in his works. In the mean time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth us with one continual course that which he had from eternity foreordaine, allowed and decreed, howsoever the alteration seemeth sudden in the eyes of men.

14. Neither doth the holic historic shew that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Ninivites which had beene before pronouncide, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning given him of death. They that to continue it are deceiued in understanding of threatenings: which although they doe simply assyne, yet by the success it shall be perceived that they contained a secret condition in them. For why did God send Joseph to the Ninivites to tell them beforehande of the ruine of their citie? Why did he by Ezechias warning of death? For he might have brought to naught both him and them without sending them any word of their destruction. He meant therefore another thing, than to make them by forknowing of their death to fee it comming a far off. Even this he meant: not to have them destroyed, but to have them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ezechias prophesied that Ninivie should fall after foretide dates, was done to this ende that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that he might obtaine longer life. Nowse who doth not see that God meant by such threatenings to awake them to repentance, whome he made afraid to the ende that they might escape the judgement which they had deferred by their finnes? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselves doth leade vs to this, to understand in the simple threatening a secret implied condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lord rebuking the king Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, with these wordes: Beholde thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for she hath a husbande. But after hee had excused himselfe, God faide thus: Restore the wife to her husband; for he is a Prophet and shall pray for thee that thou maist live. If not: knowe that thou shalt die the death and all that thou haft. You see howe in his first sentence he vehemently stricketh.
Cap. 18. Of the knowledge of striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amends, and in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawn from the first purpose of God, by this that he made voide the thing which he had before pronounced.

For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giving warning of the punishment he moueth those to repentance, whom his will is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his word, sauing that he doth not express the fame thing in syllables which is yet easie to understand. For that saying of Efai must needs remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall bee able to vndo it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

The xviiij. Chapter.

That God doth so use the service of wicked men, and so boweth their minds to put his judgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

Here ariseth a harde question out of other places, where it is faide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the fift, scarcely conceiued howe he working by them, shoulde not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and suflie condemne his ministers. Vpon this was definiied the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering: because many have thought this doubt vnpossible to bee dissolved: that both Satan and all the wicked are so vnder the hande and power of God, that hee directeth their malice, vnto what ende it plaifeth him, and vieth their wicked doings to the executing of his judgements. And their modifie were peraduen-ture excusable, whom the shewe of absurditie putteth in scare, if it were not so that they doe wrongfullie with a lying defence goe about to deliver the justice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them unreasonable, that man should by the will and commandement of God be made blinde, and fo by and be punished for his blindness. Therefore they seeke to escape by this hitte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth receiue that hitte. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secret commandement of God, and do trouble themselues in vaine with deliberating, vnleffe he doe by his secret direction stablisheth which hee hath before determined, it is proued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before allaged out of the Psalme, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there faide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelesslie with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and suiteth still?
But in speciall examples will be more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Iob we knowe, that Satan doth no leffe appere before God to receive his com-mandements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In deede it is after a diverse manner and for a diverse ende: but yet so that hee cannot goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although these seeme afterwardes to be added a bare sufferance of him to affliet the holy man: yet because that saying is ture: The Lord hath gien, the Lord hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that triall of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theues were ministers. Satan goeth about to drive the holy man by desperation to madness. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly do inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob knoweth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whateuer men
men or Satan himself attempts, yet God holdeth the ferner to turne all their travels to the executing of his judgements. It was Gods will to have the false king, Ahab declined: the duell offered his feruice thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commandment, to be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madness of Ahab be the judgement of God, then the deceit of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to face, that the judge doth only suffer and not also decree what he will have done, and command the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Jews purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the fouldiers to follow their raging lust, and yet in a solemn prayer the disciples do confess, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that the hande and counsell of God had determined: even as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose and foreknowledge of God delivered to be slain. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly and willingly appoint that which the Jews did execute, as in another place hee rehearseth, that God which slewed before all his Prophets that Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Abfolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adulterie, committed detestable wickedneffe. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the words are these: Thou hast done it secretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremias pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vift in Iunie, was the worke of God. For which tauge Nabu.dingaz is called the servant of God, God every where crieth out that with his hilling, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commandement the wicked are strait up to warre. He calleth the Allyrian the rod of his wrath, and the axe that he moueth with his hande. The destruction of the holy cite and rume of the temple hee calleth his worke. David not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous judge, yet confesseth that the curfings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (faith he) commanded him to curse. We often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoever happeneth it cometh of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sons of Holy, and very many other things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in the Scriptures doe fear, that for shortness sake, bringing forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe triffe and talk fondly, that truth in a bare Sufferance in place of the Providence of God, as though God sat in a watch Tower waiting for the chances of Fortune, and so his judgements should hang upon the will of men.

2. Now as concerning secret motions, that which Solomon speaketh of the heart of a king, that it is bowed either on either as pleaseth God, extendeth furelly to all mankindus, and is as much in effect as if he had said: whatsoever we conceyue in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to his end. And truely if he did not worke in the rumpes of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, and wifedome from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. And heereto doth belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearfull to doe foorth as their hearts be taken with their fear. So David went out of the empe of Saul, and none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come upon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where hee doth pronoounce, that hee blindeth the eyes of men, and taketh them with giddinesse, that he maketh them drunk with the spirit of drunkenesse, calleth them into madness, and hardneth their harts. These things also men do referre to Sufferance, as if in forfaking the reprobate hee suffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is too fond, for as much as the holie Ghost in plainie words expreth, that they are blinded with blindness and madnesse by the just judgement of God. It is said, that he hardened the heart of Pharaoh, also that he did make duli and strengthen it. Some doe with an indiuerie cauillation mocke. mocke out these phrases of speech, because in another place it is saide, Pharaoh did harden his owne heart, there is his owne will set for the cause of his hardning. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in divers maners, that man while he is moved in working by God, doth also work himselfe. And I doe turne backe their objection against themselves. For, to harden do signifie but a bare sufferance, then the very motion of obstinacon shall not be properly in Pharaoh. Nowe how weake and foolish were it to so to expound, as if Pharaoh did onely suffer himselfe to be hardned? Moreover the Scripture cuteth off all occasions from such caullations. For God faith, I will holde his heart. So of the inhabitants of the lande of Canaan, Moses faith, that they went forth to battle, because the Lorde had hardened their hearts. Which same thing is repeated by another Prophet, saying: Hee turned their harts that they should hate his people. Again in Esaiie he faith, that he will send the Assyrians against the deceitful full nation, and will command them to cause away the spoiles, and violently take the prouie, not meaning that hee will teach wicked and obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will boweth them to execute his judgements as if they did beare his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were moued by the certaine appointment of God. I grant that God doth oftentimes worketh in the reprobate by Satans seruice as a meanes, but yet so that Satan doth his office by Gods mouing, and proceedeth so farre as is given him. The cuill Spirit troubled Saul, but it is said that it was of God, that we may know that the madnes of Saul, came of the iust vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blinde the mindes of the vnfaithfull: but how so, but one he because the effectall working of error commeth from God himselfe, to make them beleue lies that refuse to obey they truth? After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God have deceived him. According to the other manner of speech it is saide, that he giveth men into a reprobate minde: and to cast them into filthie desires, because he is the chief author of his owne iust vengeance, and Satan is but onely a minister thereof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of free or bond will of man, I thinke I have already shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the will of God is saide to be the cause of all things, his Prudence is thought the gouernesse in all purposes and worikes of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not onely in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirit, but also compellith the reprobate to obedience.

3 Forasmuch as lutherall I have recited onely such things as are written in the Scriptures, plainly and not doubtfully, lett them that fear not wrongfully to failuer the heavenly oracles, take heed what manner of judgement they take upon them. For if by baimed pretending of ignorance they fecke a praise of modesty, what can be imagined more proudly done, then to set one small worke against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to have this touched. But if they openly speake cuill, what pruainle they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no newe example of waywardnese, because there have beenes in all ages wicked and vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thing in deed to be true, which long agoe the holy ghost spake by the mouth of David, that god may over come when he is judged. David doth by the way rebuke the madnese of men in this so vnbrided licentiousnese, that of their owne filthinesse they doe not onely argue against God, but also take vpon them power to condemme him. In the meantime he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemous which they vomit vppe against the heauen doth not reach unto God, but that he driving away the clouds of caullations, doth brightely shewe forth his righteoussnese, and also our faith (because being grounded vpon the worde of God, it is aboue all the worlde) doth from her high place contempnsuouly looke downe vpon these mystes. For first, where they object,

There are not contrary wills in God, although he forbid the doing of evil, and yet hee willing to have it done; but our blindness wherby we diserne not how these two doe agree, maketh us to imagine that they disagree when in truth they doe not.

3 John 5.4.
object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrarie wills, because he decree those things by secret purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is easily wiped away. But before I answere it, I will once againe give the readers warning that this caulation is thrown out not against me, but against the Holy Ghost, which taught the holy man Isb this confession: as it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theues, he acknowledged in the inuiure and hurt that they did him, the inft course of God. What faith the Scripture in other places? The Ionnes of Holy obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also another Prophet crieth out, that God which sifteth in heaven doth whatsoever he will. And now I have shewed plainly ynowth that God is the author of all those things which these judges would have to happen only by his idle suffrance. He refuseth that he createth light and darknesse, that he forruit good and euill, that no euill happeneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I beseech them, whether he doe willingly or against his will execute his owne judgements? But as Moses teacheth, that he which is slaine by the falling of an axe by chance, is deliueryed by God into the hand of the slasher: so the whole Church faith in Luke, that Herod and Pilate confired to doe those things, which the hand and purpose of God had decreed. And truly if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whence cam redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth strive with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faith that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is, but one and simple in him, it seemeth to vs manifolde, because according to the weakeuenesse of our wit we conceive not how God in divers maner willeth and will eth not one selfe thing. Paul after that he hath saide, that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a little after faith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifold wise-dome of God: because for the dulness of our wit the wisdome of God seemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpreter hath translated it) of many fashions: shall we therefore dreame that there is any varietie in God himselfe, as though he either changeth his purpose, or differeth from himselfe? Rather when we conceive not how God will have the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let vs call to minde our owne weakeuenesse, and therewithall consider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cause called incensibible, because it is covered with darkness. Therefore all godly and sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Auguftine, that sometime man with good will will eth that which God will eth not. As if a good Ionne willeth to have his father to live, whom God will have to die. Again it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euill will, which God will eth with a good will. As if an euill Ionne will eth to have his father to die, and God also will eth the same. Now the first of these two Ionnes will eth that which God will eth not, and the other Ionne will eth that which God also will eth, and yet the naturalnesse of the first Ionne doth better agree with the will of God, although he will eth a contrarie thing, than the unnaturalnesse of the other Ionne that will eth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, and to what ende the will of euere one is to be applied, to have it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God will eth well he bringeth to passe by the euill wills of euill men. But a little before he had saide, that the Angels apostatizes in their falling away, and all the reprobates, in as much as concerneth themselves, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no means so doe, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done upon them. Whereupon he crieth out. Great are the works of God, and ought to be sought out of all them that love them: that in maruellous maner the same thing is not done without his will which is also done against his will, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doeth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done evil, vniuelfe for that he is omnipotent, he coulde of cuill make good.

4. In the same manner is asfoiled or rather vanitheth away the other objection: that if God do not onely vfe the scince of wicked men, but also governeth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, and therefore men are vnuworthily condemmed, if they execute that which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confounde his will and commandement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre aludder. For though when Abfaion abused his fathers wines, it was Gods will to punishe Davids aduertice vnto that dishonour: yet he did not therefore command the wicked sonne to commit incest, vniuelfe perhaps you meane it in respect of Davids, as he speakeith of the railings of Semei. For whenthe he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, he doth not therein command his obedience, as if that howerd dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his too long to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffrith to bee corrected. And this is to bee holde in minde, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret judgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deed of their owne cuill luft they do purposely brake. Now how that thing is of God, and is ruled by his secret prudence, which men doe wickedlie, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is seuerely condemmed, for that they perturbed the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of David, and yet we know it was his will that he should be annoimated. Whereupon in the verie wordes of Ofees there appeareth a certaine flyewe of repugnancie, that where God complainea that his kingdome was erect withoout his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he faith, that hee gave the kingdome to Iarobeam in his rage. Howe shall these sayings agree? that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the fame God? Even thus, because neither could the people fell from the house of David, but that they must shake off the yoke which God hadlaid upon them; neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the unthankfulness of Solomon. We see therefore how god in not willing false breach of allegiance, yet to another ende vntilie willeth a falling away from their Prince, whereupon Iarobeam besides all hope was by holie annointing druen to be king. After this manner doth the holie historie faie, that there was an enmiie rased vp to spoyle Salomons sonne of part of his kingdome. Let the Readers diligently wye both these things, because it hath pleased God to haue the people governed vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two parts, it was done against his will. And yet the diuision tooke beginning of his will. For surely whereas the Prophet both by words and ceremonie of annointing did moose Iarobeam when hee thought of no fuch thing, to hope of the kingdome, this was not done without the knowledge or against the will of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people unjustly condemmed, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of David. In this manner it is also afterwardes further faide, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the request of the people, this was done by God, to confine the worde which he had spoken by the hand of Abiba his seruant. Lo how against Gods will the sacted vniitie is torn in sunder, and yet with the will of the same God ten tribes doe forsake Salomons sonne. Let vs add another like example. Where the people confenting, yet alaying their hands vnto it, the sons of Abiba were slaine, and all his offsping rooted out. Iehu said in deed truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the grounde, but that he had done all that hee had spoken by the hande of his seruant Elias. And yet not vnuitifully he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are ye eere, teous, faith he? If I have conspire against my Lord, who hath killed all these? I have before (as I think) already declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray itselfe, and also the righeteousnes of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest wits this answer of Augustine shall alway suffice: whereas the father deliuered the sonne, and Christ deliuered his bodie, and Indas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we now say, that there is no content of God with man, where man by the righeteous moving of God doth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine faith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these judgements, where God worketh even in the hearts of euill men whatsoever he will, and yet rendereth to them according to their deservings? And truly in the falshood of Indas, it shall be no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deed to God, because he himselfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, than it shall be to giue away the praise of our redemption to Indas. Therefore the same writer doth in another place truelee tell vs, that in this examination God doth not inquire what men might have done, or what they have done, but what their will was to do, that purpose and will may come into the account. They that think this hard, let them a little while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by playne testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacitie, and do find fault that those things are vtered, which God, unless he had known them profitable to be known, would never have commanded to be taught by his Prophets and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meek willingnes to learn, and that without exception whatsoever is taught in the holy scriptures. As for them that do more frowardly outrage in prating against it, such it is evident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer refutation.

The end of the first booke.

I i
THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which entreateth of the knowledge of God the redeemer in Christ which knowledge was first opened to the Fathers in the time of the Lawe, and then to vs in the Gospell.

The first Chapter.

That by Adams sin and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate, wherein is intreated of Original sin.

We must learn thoroughly to know our sins, that the consideration of the grace of God may make us thankful, and the beholding of our miseries humble us.

O T without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe become in the old Proverbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our felues: whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsel of any thing necessarie, we be miserably dazled, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heed, that we do not disorderly vie it, as we see some of the Philosophers have done. For they in exhorting man to know himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why should know himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing else do they will him to behold in himself, but that whereby he may swell with vain confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this point, that considering what was given vs in creation, and how bountifully God continued his gracious favoure toward vs, we may know how great had been the excellencie of our nature, if it continued uncorrupted: and we may withall thinke on this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as it were gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed upon vs, that we may alwayes hang upon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying and trust of our felues, overwelm vs with shame, and make us humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his own image, to the end to raise vs to the stude of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so left the so great noblenes of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfullnes, it is for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reason & understanding, that in keeping a holy & honest life, we should proceed on forward to the appointed ende of blessed immortallitie. But the first dignitie cannot come in our mind, but by and by on the other side the heauie sight of our filthines, and shame doth thrust it selfe in presence, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, whereupon growth the hatred & loathing of our felues, and true humiliation, & there is kindled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom every of vs may recover those good things, whereof we are found altogether void and empytie.

This thing is fully the truth of God appointed to be sought in examining of our felues, I mean, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all all confidence of our owne power, and making vs deстиute of all matter to glorie vpon, may bring vs to submission. Which rule it behooueth vs to keepe, if we will attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good things, than to looke vpon our miserable neediness and dishonor, which ought to outwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coutheth, than to be stroked with flatterie: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lightnesse of beleefe: whereby it is so much the lesse to be maruiled, that herein the greatest part of men haue permittiously erred. For sith there is naturally planted in all mortall men a more than blinde love of themselves, they doe most willingly persuade themselves, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this most vaine opinion doth clee where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of himselfe to make himselfe hue well and blestly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, how fouter they graunt somewhat to God, least they should seeme arrogantly to take all to themselves, yet they so part it, that the principal matter of glory and confidence alway remaineth with themselves. Nowe if there come talke, that with her allurements tickleth the pride that already of it felteth itself within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his exquolling most favouably advancd the excellency of mans nature, so hath he bene excepted with the well liking rejoycement in manner of all ages. But whatsoever such commendation there be of mens excellency that tickleth man to rest in himselfe, it doth nothing but delite with that her sweetness, and indeede so deceiteth, that it bringeth to most wretched destruction all them that affent unto it. For to what purpose availed he it for, standing vpon all vaine confidence to clewfe, appoint, attempt and goe about those things that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our self beginning of enterprise to be forsaken and destitute of sound understanding and true strength, and yet to goe so boldly till we fall downe into destruction? But it cannot otherwise happen to them that haue affiance, that they can doe any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man gue heede to such teachers that hold vs in considering onely our owne good things, he shall not profite in learning to know himselfe, but shall be carried violently away into the worfe kindes of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common natural meaning of all men, that the second part of wisdom consisteth in the knowledge of our felues, yet in the very matter of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the judgement of the flesh, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe, when trusting vpon his owne understanding and integritie, he taketh boldnesse, and encourageth himselfe to doing the duties of vertue, and biding battle to vices, travaileth with all his study to bend himselfe to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh vpon and trieth himselfe by the rule of Gods judgement, findeth nothing that may raise vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoyled of all confidence, he leaneth to himselfe nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God have vs to forget the first noblenes that he gave to our Father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteoussnesse and goodnesse. For we cannot consider other our owne first estate, or to what ende we are created, but we shall be pricked forward to study vpon immortalitie, and to desire the Kingdome of God. But that consideration is so farre from putting vs in courage, that rather discouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humblenesse. For what is that first estate of ours? even that from whence we are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? even the same from which we are altogether turned away: so that loathing our own miserable estate, we may gone for sorrow, and in groaning may also sigh for the losse of that dignity. But now when we say that man ought to beholde nothing in himselfe that may make him of bold courage, we meant that there is nothing in him upon affiance whereof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any lift to heare what knowledge man ought to have of himselfe, let vs thus divide it, that first he consider to what end he is created; and endued with gifts that are not to be despised, by which thought he may be stirred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him wend his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiving whereof he may lye in extreme confusion, as one utterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that he may know what is his duetie: and the other, how much he is able to do towards the performing of it. We will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But because it must needs be that it was not slight negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so severely punished, we must consider the very forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God upon all mankind. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly beene received, concerning the intemperance of gluttony, as though the same and head of all vices consisted in the forbearing of one only fruit, when there flowed one effectuall store of all sortes of delicacies that were to be desired, and when in that blessed fruitfulness of the earth, there was not onely plente, but also varietie to make faire for pleasure. Therefore we must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might prove that he was willingly subject to the government of God. And the name of the tree itselfe sheweth, that that commandement was given for none other end, than for this, that he contented with his owne estate should not with wicked lust advance himselfe higher. But the promise whereby he was bidde to hope for eucnall life, so long as he did not eate of the tree of life, and against, the horrible threatening of death so soone as hee should taste of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, servd to proue and exercise his Faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what means Adam provoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine in his faith not amisse, when he faith, that pride was the beginning of all euills.
For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull and than was permitted him, he might have continued in his estate: but we must fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moses desibreb. For is the woman was with the decrete of the Serpent led away by infidility, now it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, reaching that all men were lost by one mans disobedience. But it is wishefull to be noted, that the first man fell from the subjection of God, for that he not onely was taken with the enticements of Satan, but also desiring the truth, did turne out of the way to lying. And Surely Gods word being once deputed, all reverence of God is shaken off. Because his majestie doth no other waies abide in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inviolate, but while we hang vp his mouth. Therefore infidility was the roote of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulness; for that Adam in counting more than was granted, did vnreconnetly despise the so great liberallitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that he was made after the likenesse of God, vnlike he might also be made equall with God. If Apoistacie be a filthy and detestable offence, whereby man draweth himselfe from the allegiance of his Creator, yea, outrageouslie shak-eth off his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the sinne of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apoistacie, but annoyed with shamefull reprooches against God, while they attainted to the slaughters of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying, enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, insidelie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the fear of God, and thowse themselves whether their lust carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly reach that the gate of salvation is opened unto vs, when at this day we receive the Gospel by our eares: even as by the same windowes, when they flood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would not have beene so bold, as to doe against the commandement of God, but for this, that he did not beleue his worde. Truly this was the best bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to kepe righteousness in obeying the commanden-tments of God, and then that the chief ende of happy life is to be beloved of him.
He therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the dwuell, did (asmuch as in him lay) extinguish the whole glory of God.

5 As the spirituall life of Adam was, to abide joyned and bounde to his Creator; fo his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it marueile if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posteritie, which perverted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures doe groane, faith Paule, being made subjicet to corruption against their will. If one should ask the cause: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment that man deserveth, for whose vile they were created. Sith then the curse that goeth throughout all the coates of the world, proceeded from his fault both upwark and downwarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heavenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wife-dome, strength, holinesse, truth, and iustice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the most horde petulences, blindnesse, weakness, filthinesse, falhood, and inuicte, but also he entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the same miseries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called original sinne, meaning by this word sinne, the cor-rupction of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they have had much contention, because there is nothing further off from common reason, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which seemeth to have beene the cause why the oldst Doctors of the Church did but daintly touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was convenient. And yet that fearfullnesse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophane intention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne loffe, and hurted not his posteritie. So through this subtertice, Satan went about by hiding the disease, to make it incurable. But when it was proved by manifest testimony of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, hee brought this caullation, that it passd by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefor good men travailed in this point, and about all other Augustine, to shew that we are corrupted not by foreine wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begeriting, which to deny was too great shamelesnesse. But the rhetorics of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme marvellous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shall perceive, how shamelesse beastes they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubt-fully spoken that David confesseth that he was begotten in inquiickes, and by his mother conceived in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodness of God toward him, he beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begeting. Forasmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to David alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted vnder his example. All we therefore that descende of vnclane seede, are borne infected with the contagion of sinne, yea, before that we see the light of this life, we be in the sight of God filthie and spotted. For who could give cleanse of the vncleanness? not one: as it is in the booke of Job.

Of the knowledge of

6 Wee heare that the vncleanness of the parents so pasteth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning vncliffwe go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde worthily corrupted: which the Aposttle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (Faith he)by one man sinne entred into the whole world, and death by sinne, and so didst author over all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteoufnesse and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians heere prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then have we no other profite by the righteoufnes of Christ, but that he is an example set before vs to followe?

Who can abide such robbere of Gods honour? If it be out of question that Christes righteoufnesse is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth also that they both were fo lost in Adam, as they be recovered in Christ: and that sinne and death do crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore these two are in this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him; and Christ with his grace restored vs to salvation. In so elecere light of trouth, I think we nee neede not a longer or more laborous prose. So also in the hift Epistle to the Corinthians, when he goeth about to stablishe the godly in the vught of the resurrection, he sheweth that the life is recovered in Christ,that was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth also therewith all plainly teallise, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reach vs to them that were touched with no guiltinesse of iniquitie. But it can be no way plausible understand-what he meaneth then by relation of the other member of the sentence, where he tealliseth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough known that the same is done no other way, than when by marvellous manner of communicating, Christ powreth into vs the force of his righteoufnesse. As it is written in another place, that the spirite is life vnto vs, for righteoufnesse sake.

Therefore we may not otherwise expound that which is said that we are dead in

Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischiefe and ruin to himselfe, but also threw downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not only to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected all his poster with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paul the could not stand true, that all are by nature the soules of wrath, if they were not already accuses in the wombe. And it is easily gathered that nature is there meant not such as it was created by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient, that God should be made the author of death.

Adam therefore fo corrupted himselfe, that the infection passed from him into all his offspring. And the heavenly judge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly enough pronounced, that all are borne suil and corrupted, where be teacheth, that whatsoeuer is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

7 Neither for the understanding thereof is any curious disputation needesfull, which not a little combated the old writers, whether the soule of the soule do pro-ceede by derivation from the soule of the father, because in it the infection principally reseth. Wee must be content with this, that such gifts as it pleased the Lorde to have bestowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after he had receivd them, he lost them not onely from.

from himselfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be careful of a conuenance from soule to soule, when he shall heare that Adam received these ornaments which he left, no leffe for vs than for himselfe? that they were not guened to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not against reaon, if he being royaled, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottennesse into the other twigges that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the father, that they also were infective to their children: that is to say, so was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continually flowing from one to another, it is conueyed from the ancesstors into the posterity. For the infection had not her cause in the substance of the soule of the soule, but because it was so ordened of God, that such gifts as he had guened to the first man, man should both haue them, and lose them as well for himselfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe caull, that it is not likely that the children doe take corruption from godly parents, sist they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleanliness, that is easily confuted. For they descend not of their spirittuall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine saith, whether the unbelieuer be condemned as guiltie, and the beleuere quitte as innocent, they both doe beget not innocents, but guiltie, because they beget of the corrupted nature. Now where as they doe in manner partake of the parents holinesse, that is the speciall blesting of the people of God, which proueth not but that the first and vnuerfall curse of mankinde went before. For of nature is guiltinesse, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8 And to the ende that these things be not spoken of a thing yncertaine and unknown, let vs define Original sinne. But yet I mean to not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one only, which I thinke to be most agreeable with truth. Original sinne therefore seemeth to be the inheritably defonding perverfitie and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the partes of the soule, which first makest vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the flesh: and that it properly that Paul oftentimes called sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, theifes, hatreds, murthers, bankettings, after the same manner he calleth the fiuites of sinne, albeit they are likewise called sinnes both commonly in the Scriptures, and also by the same Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctly to be noted: that is, that being so in all partes of our nature corrupted and perverted, we are now even for such corruption onely holden worthyly damned and convicted before God, to whom is nothing acceptable but righteousness, innocencie and parentesse. And yet is not that bondes in respect of anothers fault. For where it is said, that by the sinne of Adam we are made subject to the judgement of God, it is not so to be taken, as if we innocents and vnderdefinuere did beare the blame of his fault. But because of his offending we are all clothed with the curse, therefore is it saide that hee hath bounde vs. Nevertheless, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection distilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is justly due. Wherefore how souer Augustine doth oftentimes call it an others sinne, (to shew the more plainly, that it is conveyed into vs by propagation) yet doth he also afirme withall that it is proper to every one. And the Apostie Rom.3,12. himselfe expressly witnessed, that therefore death came vpon all men, because all men have sinne, and are wrapped in Original sinne, and defiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the very infants themselves, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by anothers, but by their owne fault. For though they have not as yet brought forth the fruits of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the seede thereof enclosed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certaine seed of sinne: therefore it cannot be but hatefull and abominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly accounted sinne before God: for there could be no guiltines without sin. The other point is, that this present sinnes neuer ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, even the same worke of the flesh that we haue before described: like as a burning furnace bloweth our flame and sparkles, or as a spring doth without ceasing call our water. Therefore they which haue defined Originall sinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteousnes which ought to haue beene in vs, although in deed they comprehend all that is in the thing it selfe: yet they haue not fully enough expressed the force and efficacie thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and empty of goodnesse, but also is so plentuous and fruitfull of all evils, that it cannot be idle. They that haue faide, that it is a concupiscence, haue vfed a worde not very far from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the most part, that whatsoever is in man, even from the understanding to the will, from the soule to the flesh, is corrupted and stuffed full with this concupiscence: or, to end it shortlier, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupiscence.

9 Wherefore, I haue faide that all the parts of the soule are possesed of sinne, 6th Adam fell away from the fountain of righteousnesse. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possesed the very castle of his mind, and pride pearced to the innermost part of his heart. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restraine the corruption that proceeded from thence, only to the sensual motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine naturall that allureth, stirreth and draweth to sinne onely that part, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath disclosed his gross ignorance, which seeking & searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paul witnesseth, not properly in deede, but because it more appeareth in the flesh, as though Paul did meane only a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace: And Paul there taketh away all doubt: teaching that corruption refleth not in one part alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doth not onely condemn the inordinate motions of appetites that appear, but specially teacheth to proue that the understanding mundane is subject to blindness, and the hart to peruerfnesse. And the same third Chapter to the Romans is nothing else but a description of originall sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirit which is compared with the old man and the flesh, doth not onely dignifie the grace whereby the inferiour or sensual part of the soule is amended, but also containeth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth command, not onely that our gross appetites be brought to naught, but also that we ourselves be renewed in the spirit of our minde, as likewise in another place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newensesse of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the same part, wherein most of all thineeth the excellencie and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a new nature. How faire sinne possesst both the understanding minde and the hart, we will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the footes is so overwhelmed as with an overflowing of water, that no part of him is free from sinne, and that therefore whatsoeuer proceedeth from him is accounted for sinne, as Paul saith, that all the affections of the flesh or thoughts are enmities against God, and therefore death.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sinnes, because we say that men are naturally fullfull. They doe wrongfully feke the worke of God in their owne filthines, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sound and uncorrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our own flesh and not of God, forasmuch as we perished by no other man but by this, that we degended from our first estate. But yet let not any man here be murmured and saie, that God might have better foresene for our saluation, if he had provided that Adam should not have fallen. For this objection both is to be abhorred of all godlie minde, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination, which shall after bee entreated of in place convenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in deed it is, that the same deadly wounde sticketh fast in nature: but it is much matterall to know, whether it came into nature from elsewhere, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is evident that the wounde was giuen by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why wee shoulde complaine but of our felues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This hauie I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they have sought many inventions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as having gotten vnrighteousnes by the goodness of God, he by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

11 We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. We denie that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiaall property that hath bene put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it Naturall, that no man should thinke that every man geteth it by euill custome, whereas it holdeth all men bounde by inheritauntly defensing right. And this we do not of our owne heads without authority. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath, Howe could God, whom all his meaneest works do please, be wrathfull against the noblesst of all his creatures? But he is rather wrathfull against the corruption of his works, than against his works it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly faide to be by nature abominable to God, it shall bee also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes natural, which doe necnesarily raigne in our flesh where the grace of God is absent. So vanifheth away the foolish trifling deuise of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse having substance in man, presumed to forge for him a new Creator, leaff they should feene to assigne to the righteous god the cause and beginning of euill.

That man is now spoile of the Freedome of will, and made subject to miserable bondage.

Sith we have seene, that the dominion of sinne, since the time that it held the first man bound vnato it, both not onely reigne in all mankinde, but also wholly possesseth every soule: now must we more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoile of all freedome or no: and yet there remaine anie parcell, how farre the force thereof procedeth. But to the ende that the truth of this question may more easily appeare vnato vs, I will by the waye set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shall be the best waie to auoide errore, if the dangers be considerd that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from all vnrighteousnes, by and by he thereby taketh occasion of slouethfulness: and because it is faide, that by himselfe he can do nothing to the studie of righteousnesses,

teaches, forthwith hee neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing unto him. Again, he can presume to take nothing upon himselfe, be it neuer so little, but that both Gods honour shall be thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be ouerthrowne with rash confidence. Therefore to the ende we strike not vpon these rockes, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodness, and being on every side compassed about with most miserable necessity, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is voide, and to the libertie whereof he is depruned, and may be more sharply flaired vp from slothfulnes, than if it were fained that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessearie this second point is, every man feeth. The firft, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controversy, it ought then plainly to stand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as farre as it behooueth that he be thrown downe from falfe boasting of himselfe. For if it were not graunted to man to glory in himselfe even at that time, when by the bountifullnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornaments, how much ought he now to be humbled, that for his unthankfulness he is thrust downe from his glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I faie) when he was advanced to the highest degree of honour, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it secretely teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth nowe, but that he being naked and destitute of all glorie, do acknowledge God, to whose liberalitie he could not be thankful when he flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne poueritie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profit, that all praife of wisdom and strength be taken from vs, as it pertaineth to the glorie of God that they joyn our owne with the robberie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when we are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on lie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breeke, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vain men have imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without causse is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather thrown downe headlong, than stablisshed by them that defende it. This I thought needfull to speake before, as by waie of Preface for manie mens takes, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowne from the grounde, that the power of God may bee builded in man, doe much hate this manner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfuous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion necessarie, and for vs most profitable.

Whereas we have a little before saide, that in the understanding minde, and in the hart are placed the powers of the soule, nowe let vs consider what they both are able to do. The Philosophers indeed with great content do imagine that in the understanding minde fitteth reason, which like a lampe giueth light to all counsels, and like a Queene governeth the will, for they say that it is so endued with divine light, that it can giue good counsell, and so excelleth in lively force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other side, that fene is dull and bleare eieed, that it alway creept on the grounde, and walloweth in grosse objects, and neuer lifteth vp it selte to true insight. That the appetit if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yeeld it selte to fene to be subdued, is carried on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, & is transformed into will: but if it giue it selte subiect into the bondage of fene, it is by it corrupted and perverted, so that it degendreth into luft. And whereas by their opinion there do fit in the soule those powers that I have spokenc of before, understanding, fene, appetite or will, which worde will is now more commonly yeied, they say say that understanding is endowed with reason, the best governor of good and blessed life, so that it doth hold it selfe within his owne excellency, and sheweth forth the force that is naturally given it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called sense, where with man is drawn to error and deceit, they say to be such, that it may be themed with the rod of reason, and by little & little be vanquished. They place will in the middle between reason and sense, as a thing at her owne ordering, & hating liberty whether it lift to obey to reason, or giveth forth it selfe to be rauished by sense.

3. Sometime in deed they doe not dene, being overcome by very experience, how hardly man stablisheth reason to reign as Queen within himselfe, while sometime he is tickled with enticements of pleasure, sometime deceived with false semblance of good things, sometime impreumarily smitten with moderate affections, and violently hale out of the way as it were with ropes or stringes of striewes, as Plato hath. For which reason Cicero saith, that these spikes given by nature, are with peruerse opinions and cuill manners by and by quenched: But when such diseases have once gotten places in the minds of men, they grant that they do more outrageously over flow, than that they easily may be restrained: and they strike not to compare them to wilde horses which throwing away reason as it were casting the Chariot druen, doe range vnruledly and without measure. But they make no question of that virtues and vices are in our owne power. For it (say they) is in our choice to doe this or that, then is it also in our choice not to doe. Now if it be in our choice not to doe, then is it also to doe, but of free choice we seeme to doe those things that we doe, and to forbear those things that we forbear. Therefore if we do any good thing, when we lift, we may likewise leaue it vndone: if we doe any cuill, we may also effchew the same. Yet some of them haue burst forth into so great licentiouines, that they haue boasted that it is indeede Gods gift that we have, but our owne that we live well and holy. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Ossa: because every man himselfe getreth virtue to himselfe, therefore neuer any of the wise men did thame God for it. For (faith he) for vertue we be praised, and in vertue we glorie, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our selues.

And a little after: This is the judgement of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wise done to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers: that the reason of mans understanding is sufficient for a right governance: that Will being subiect to it, is in deed mooved by Senes to cuill things. But euem as it hath free election, so can it not be stoped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4. Among the Ecclesiasticall writers, albeit there haue beene none that did not acknowledge both that the soundness of reason in man hath beene force wound by saine, and his will exceedingly entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much allented to the Philosophers, of which the auncient, as I thinke, did so much advance the strength of man upon this consideration, leseth if they should haue expressly confest his weakeenesse, forth they should have made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then leseth they should give to the flesh, which of it selfe was due to goodnesse, a new occasion of slothfulness. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that was an absurditie in the common judgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, not to make place for slothfulnesse, appeareth by their owne wordes. Chrysostome hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and cuill things in his owne power, he hath giuen vs freedome of election, and he withholdeth not the unwilling, but embraceth the willing. Against oftentimes he that is cuill, if hee will, is turned into good, and hee that is good by slothfulness falleth and becometh cuill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he.

he layeth not necessitie vpon vs, but giving convenient remedies, suffieth all to lie in the mind of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse we be holpen by the grace of God, we can never doe any thing well: so vnlesse we bring that which is our owne, wee cannot obtaine the fauour of God. And he had faide before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeeth that which Hieron faith, that it is our part to begin, but Gods to make an ende: our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see now that in these sayings they gaue to man towaarde the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dul-ness that was naturally in vs. But if they did prooue that in it onely we sinned, with what apt handling they haue done the same, we shall after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrysostome have faide measure in aduauncing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or waver, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore wee will not tarrie upon exact reckonings of euerie one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of every one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euerie one for him-selfe sought praefte of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worse and worse, till it came to farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted onely in his sensual part, and to have reason altogether, and will for the more part vn corrupted. In the mean time this flew about in all mens mouthes, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundredth man did euen slightly understand. As for my part, if I would plainly shew of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easilie contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be heedfully weyed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoyled of his supernaturall giftes, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselves to be the disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vn corrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vfe the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe. Because therefore all, euén to the common people, had recived this principle, that man was endued with Freewill, and many of them that would seeme excellent, cannot tell how farre it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, and then let vs proceede on by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shew what man is able to doe of his owne nature, toward good or euill. What Freewill is, whereas it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet fewe have defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he faide, that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euill, and a power of will to chuse either of them. And Augustine varieeth not from him, when he teacheth, that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euill when grace ceaseth. Bernard, while he meaneth to speake more subtly, speaketh more darkly, which faileth, that it is a consent by reason of the libertie of will that cannot be loft, and the judgement of reason that cannot be auoyed. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar enough, which faileth that it is a power to keepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Schoolemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they faile that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of
of their own such things as they thought either to be better, or to shew for plain declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choice, is rather to be referred to reason, whose part is to discern between good and evil things; and the affection Free, pertaining properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, this Freedome properly belongeth to will; Thomas faith, that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of un-derstanding and appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue wee in what things they teach that the power of Free will consitteth, that is to sake, in reason and will. Now remaineth that we shortly see how much they gyue to either part.

5 They are commonly wont to make subjicet to the free determination of man, things mean, that is, which belong not to the kingdom of God: but they do referre true righteousness to the speciall grace of God and spiritual regeneration. Which thing while the author of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shew, hee reckoneth vp three sorts of Willes, the first Sensate, the second Naturall, the third Spiritual, of which he faith, that man hath the first two at his owne liberty, the last is the worke of the holy Ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shall be entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Herewith it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of free will they principally seek not what it is able to do to ciuill or outward dooings, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which latter point I thinke to be the principal, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I will, I shall shew a good reason. There hath beene a distincion received in Schoole, that reckoneth vp three sorts of Freedomes, the first, from necessitie, the second from sine, the third from miserie. Of which the first is naturally fetched fast in man, that it can by no means be taken away: the other two are loft by sinne. This distincion I willingly receive, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfull counfounded with compulsion: betweene which two how much difference there is, and how necessitie that difference is to be considered, shall appeare in another place.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controversy that man hath not free will to do good worke, vnlesse he bee holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is givne to the only elect by regeneration. For I do not passe upon these phantamke men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether depruin of power to doe well, or whether he have yet some power, although it be but little and weak, which by it selfe in deed doe can nothing, but by help of grace doth also her part. While the Master of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he faith there are two sorts of grace necessarie for vs, whereby wee may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby we effectuall will to do good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which division this I mislike, that while he guesseth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly theneth his meaning that man alreadie of his owne nature, after a certain manner, desireth good though useffectuall. As Bernard affirming that good will is indeed the worke of God, yet this he granteth to man, that of his owne motion he desirith that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Bernard woulde seeme to have borrowed this division. In the second part of the division, the doubfulnes of speech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore worke together with the second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make voide the first grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the book, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus express it, that it is free for them that we the judgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may.

may be woorthie reward not to have departed, and that the thing which could not be done but by the working togethier of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose will it was possible to have not beene done. These two things I had wil to note by the way, that nowe Reader, thou maist see how much I differ from the soundest of the schoolemen. For I doe much farther differ from the later Sophisters, even so much as they be farther gone from the ancient time. But yet somewhat, after such a fort as it is, we perceiue by this diuision, after what manner they have given free will to man. For at length Lombarde faith, that we have not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to do or to thinke good and evil, but only that we are free from compulsion: which freedom is not hindered, although we be pervertie and the bondmen of sine, and can do nothing but sine.

7 Therefore, man shall be faide to have free will after this fort, not because he hath a free choice as well of good as of evil, but because he doth will by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well faied: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proud a title? A goodly libertie forthe more man be not compell to serve sine: or is he yet a willing servant that his will is holden fast bound with the fetters of sine. Truely I do abhorre struing about words wherewith the church is vainely weared, but I thinke that such words are with great religions carefullnes to be taken heed of, which found of any absurditie, specially where the errors is hurtfull. How few I pray you are there, which when they heare that free will is assigned to man, do not by and by conceiue, that he is Lord both of his own nature, and that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether part he will? But some one will say, that perill shall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsitie, he will sooner conceiue an error of one little worde, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we have a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in manner that came after, while they tike from the natural signification of the worde, have beene carried into a truist of themselves that bringeth them to destruction.

8 But if the authoritie of the fathers do mooue vs, they have indeed continually the word in their mouth: but they doe withall declare, how much they esteeme the vs of it. First of all Augustine, which sticke not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angrie with them that deie free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he faith onely, Let not any man be so bold to deie the freedome of will, that he go about to excue sine. But furieul in another place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do bende and conquer it. Againe, that when will was overcome with sine, whereinto it fell, nature bade to want freedome. Againe, that man haung ill vsed his free will, loft both himselfe and it. Againe, free will is become captue, that it can doe nothing towarde righteousnes. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that the justice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strengthe, but when the holy Ghost helpeith, and man will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendreth a cause, when in another place he witteth, that man receuied great force of free will when he was created, but he loft it by finning. Therefore in another place, after that he had showed that free will is stablilied by grace, he sharply inuoceth against them that take it upon them without grace. Why thenfore (faith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they bee made free, or of their owne strengthe if they be alreadie made free? And they marke not that in the vere name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the spirit of the Lorde is, there is freedome. If then they be the bondmen of sine, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they be be made free, why doe they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bonderants, which faith: Without my yee can doe nothing? Beside that also in another place he feemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he faide, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to rightcounsesse, but the bonderant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from rightcounsesse, but by choice of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Sameur. Hee that doeth rightly, that the freedome of man is nothing elle but a freemaking or manumission from rightcounsesse, feemeth trimly to mocke at the very name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by me for so doing. But because I think it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefite to the Church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would with other, if they ask me counsell, to forbear it.

9 I may seeme to have brought a great prejudice against myselfe, which have confessed, that all the ecclesiastical writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doubt-fully or dutefully in this matter, that no certaine can be had out of their writings.
For some will to construe this, that I meant therefore to thorow them from giving any voice herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other ende but this, that I only and in good faith would have godly wits proued for, which if they waite vpon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway wauuer uncer-taine. In such sort doe they sometime teach, man being spoiled of all strengthe of free will, to vee to grace onely: sometime they vurnish or feeme to vurnish him with his owne armoure. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doubtfulnesse of speech, they nothing, or very little esteeming mans strengthe, haue given the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certaine sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine to oftene repeated, that we ought to glory of nothing, because we haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoiled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vpon God? What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Excbnius, when they expund, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall liue? and that the tree of knowledge of good and euill, is the free choice of will, whereof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall die? What meaneth that of chrysostem, that every man is naturally not onely a sinne, but also altogether sinne? If we have no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawful to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should caull, that I choose out those things onely that make for my purpose, and doe craftly leave out such things as make against me, therefore I doe forbear such rehearseall. Yet this I dare afferne, howsoever they be sometime too busie in advancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strengthe reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

And truly so oft as this lust inundath our minde, that we desire to have somewhat of our owne, which may rest in our selues rather than in God, let vs knowe that this thought is ministred vs by no other counsellor, but by him that persuaded our first parents, to have a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. It is the word of the ducell that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vsleffe we lift to take counsell of our enemie. It is pleasant in deede, for a man to have so much strengthe of his owne, that he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allurred to this vaine affiance, let so many false sentences make vs afraye, by which we bee thrown downe: as are, Cupid is he which raiseth in man, and setteth flesh to be his arm. Againe, that God hath not pleasure in the strengthe of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, and attend vpon his mercie. Againe, that it is he which giueth strengthe vnto him that fainteth, and vnto him that hath no strengthe, he encreaseth power, even the young men shall faint and be weary, and the yong men shall stumble and fall, but they that waite vpon the Lord, shall renew their strengthe. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strengthe, be it neuer so little, if we meane to haue God fauourable vnto vs, which resifteth the proud, and giueth grace to the humble. And then againe, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will powre our water vpon the thristie, and Flouds vpon the drye ground. Againe, alle ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises doe teftifie, that none are admitttd to receitue the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne pouer. And such promises are not to be passe over, as is that of Ezech: Thou shalt haue no more funne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Mone shone vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine everlafting light, and the God thy glorie. The Lorde in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Mone from his servaunts, but because he will him selfe alone appeere glorious in them, he calleth their confidence far away, euon from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

11 Truly, that saying of Chrysostome hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisedome is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, as (faith he) that fame Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the second, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the third, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske me of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Second, and Thirde time, and alwaies I would answere Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some little vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and hauintesse of minde, but when he truly feeleth himselfe to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place he declareth. Let no man (Saith he) flatter him selfe: of his owne he is a ducell. That thing whereby he is blest, he hath of God onely. For what haft thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteounesse is Gods. Again, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maimed, troubled and loft, it needeth a true confession, and not a faile defence. Again, when every man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe he hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the wars are ceased. But it is needfull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in funder, shattered in pieces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. How much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receieth thee. So vpon the threefore and ten Psalm he forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteounesse, that we may acknowledge the righteounesse of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commend his grace vnto vs, that we may knowe our selues to be nothing, that we stande onely by the mercie of God, when of our selues we are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore stinde here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our saluation which is giuen to him. For as our humbleness is his highness, so the confession of our humbleness hath his mercie readie for remedie. Neither yet do I require that man not convinced should willingly yield himselfe: nor if he hath any power, that he should turne his minde from it, to be subdued unto true humilitie. But that laying away the disafe of selfe-love and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, he thinketh too highly of himself, he should well consider himselfe in the true looking glasse of the Scripture.

12 And the common laying which they have borrowed out of Augustine pleafeth me well, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made empiotic. For in this latter part of supernaturall gifts, they vnderfand as well the light of faith as of righteousness, which were sufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternall felicitie. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdom of God, he was also depruited of the spiritual gifts, wherewith he had been furnished to the hope of eternall saluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdom of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguiished in him, vntill by grace of regeneration he recover them. Of that sort are faith, the love of God, charity towards our neighbours, the studie of holiness and righteousness. All these things, because Christ restored them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Again, foundnes of the vnderstanding minde and vprightnes of hart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of natural gifts. For though there remaine somewhat of vnderstanding and judgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our vnderstanding is found and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesse. And as for our will, the peruerfnes thereof is more than sufficiently known. Sundry therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth betwixt good and cuell, whereby he vnderstandeth and judgeth, is a natural gift, it could not but be altogether destroyed, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that foule runes thereof appeare. In this fome doth John say, that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not. In which wordes both things are plainly express'd, that in the peruered and degendred nature of man, there shine yet some some sparks that shew that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from brute beaftes, because he is indued with vnderstanding; and yet that this light is choked with great thickenes of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, because it is inseparable from the nature of man, petished not, but was bounde to peruerfes desires, that it can execute no good thing. This is a complete definition, yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talle may proceed according to that first distinction, wherein we deuide the foule of man into vnderstanding and will: let vs first examine the force of vnderstanding. So to condemn it of perpetuall blindness, that a man leue vnto it no manner of skill in any kind of things, is not onely against the word of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For wee see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out truthe, to which he would not aspire at all, but hauing felt some fayour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans vnderstanding, that he is naturally drawn with loue of truthe, the neglecting whereof, in brute beaftes produceth, a groffe Scamse without reaon, albeit, this little desire, such as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by faileth into vanitie. For the witte of man cannot for dulnese keepe the right way to search out truthe, but strayeth in divers errors, and as it were groping in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, til at length it wander and vanish away, so in seeking truthe, it doth betray howe vnfit it is to seek and find truthe. And then it is fore troubled with another vanitie, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with some curiosity, in searching out things superfluous and nothing worthy; and to things most necessarie to bee knownen, it either taketh no heed, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarce at any time appliceth its studie carnefully unto them. Of which peruersefesse, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is founde, that all men haue entangled themselves with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all these studys, in which men thinke themselves to bee verie wise, yet hee pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

33 Yet doe not all treatises of Witte so alway become void, but that it attaineth somewhat specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferior things. Yea, and it is not to blockish, but that it tasteth also some little of the higher things, howsoever it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vp above the compass of this present life, then is it principally convinced of her owne weaknesse. Wherefore, that we may the better see how farre according to the degrees of her ability, it proceeded in every thing, it is good that I put for such a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one understanding of earthly things, an other of heavenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concerne God and his kingdom, true righteousnesse and the blessednesse of eternal life, but have all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were contained within the boundes thereof. Heavenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Of the first sort are policie, gourernance of householde, all handie crafts, and liberall Sciences. Of the second sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature givn to live in companies together: he is also by naturall infinition bent to cherish and to preserve the fellowship of these companies, therefore wee see that there are in all men naturall impressions of a certaine civill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that understandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiuth not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men unto lawes, because the goodes thereof are naturally plantned in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I were not the diffusions and sightings that afterward arise while some desire to pervert lawe and right, the loose absolute government of Kings, that lust strayeth abroad in stead of right, as thecues and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be viuinit, which other haue stablished for just: and on the other side stifely say, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men doe not therefore have lawes, because they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raing with headie lust, doe fight against manifest reason, and for their fanrie doe abhorre that, which in understanding of minde they allowe. The latter sort of it struing in such, that taketh not away the first conceiuing of equitie. For when men do dispute among themselves, concerning the points of lawes, they agree together in a certaine samne of equitie. Whereas it prooued the weaknesses of mans wit, which even then when it seemeth to followe the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but full this remaineth true, that there is foemen in all men a certaine feede of politike order. And that is a large proove, that in the ordering of this life, no man is voids of the light of reason.

14 Now do followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doeth appeare Nature the force of mans withe: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no man found, whoe conceit of withe doth not in some arte or other shew forth it selfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facultie to learne, but also to deuise in every arte some new thing, either to amplifie or make perfect that which hath been learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it moued Plato erroniouslie to teach, that such conceiuing is nothing else, but a calling to remembrance, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confesse, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the withe of man. These points therefore doe plainly testified, that there is given to men naturally an vnuerall conceiuing of reason and of understanding. Yet is it so an vnuerall benefite, that therein every man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankfulness the creator himselfe doth sufficiently awake vs, when he createth naturall foolses, in whom he maketh vs to see with what giftes mans soule excelleth, if it be not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberallitie towards every man. But the intuention and orderly teaching of the same artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a few, is no perfect argument of the common conceiuing of withe, yet because of without difference it happeneth to the godly and wngodly, it is rightfully reckoned among naturall giftes.

15 So oft therefore as we light upon prophane writers, let vs be put in minde by that maruellous light of truth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, how much sooner it be perverted and fallen from the first integritie, is yet clothed and garnished with excellent giftes of God. If we consider that the spirite of God is the only fountain of truth, we will neither refuse nor despise the truth it selfe, whereby it shall appear, except we will dishonestly vs the spirite of God: for the giftes of the holy Ghost cannot be fet light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe. And what? shall we deny that the truth tuned to the olde Lawyers, which have set forth Civill order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall we say that they had no withe, which by seeking in order the arte of speech, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which infecting forth Philisicke haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall we thinke them doing errours of madde men? no, rather we cannot reade the writings of the olde men, concerning these things, whithout great admiration of their withe. But shall we thinke any thing pracie worthie or excellent, which we doe not reknowledg to come of God? Let vs be ashamed of so great unthankfulnesse into which the heathen Poets fell not, which confudd that both Philosophic and Lawes, and all good Artes, were the inventions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whom the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharp and deepe light in searching out of inferiour things, let vs learne by such examples, how many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath been spoiled by the false gifts wherein God endued him.

16 But in the meantime yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good giftes of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde haue dealt abroad to whom it pleaseth him. For if it be conuided, that the understanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, should be powred into Befleeel and Oliab by the spirite of God, it is no maruell if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be fai to be communicated vnto vs by the spirite of God. Neither is there cause why any man should aske, what haue the wicked to doe with Gods spirite, which are altogether estranged from God.
For where it is said that the spirit of God dwelleth in the faithful only: that is to be understood of the spirit of sanctification, by which we are consecrate to God himself, to be his temples; yet doth he nevertheless fill, moue and quicken all things with the virtue of the same spirit, and that according to the properitie of every kind which he hath given to it by law of creation. If it have been the Lord's will that we should be holpen by the trauell and fauice of the wicked in natural Philoſophy, Dialeceke, the Mathematurall knowledges, and other: let us vie it, least if we neglect the gifts of God, willingly offered in them, we suffer inf punishment for our foolishneſse. But let any should thinke a man to be blessed, when under the elements of this world there is granted unto him so great an ability to conceive truth, it is also to be added that all this power to understand, and the understanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where is not a steadfast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truly, whom (as we have said) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Schollem are compelled to affent vnto, as the free gifts were taken from man after his fall, so these natural gifts which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselves in al much as they come from God, but because they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that he should have no praise of them.

17. Let this be the summe: that it is useful that in all mankinde is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beastes, as brute beastes doe in fffe from things without life. For whereas there bee borne of certaine natural fools and idiots, that default obscureth not the generall grace of God: but rather by such high we are put in minde, that what is left vnto our felues, ought juiftly to be ascribed to the kindnesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpnesse of conceiuing, some other doe passe in judgement, some have a quicker wit to learne this or that art: in this varietie God setteth forth his grace vnto vs, that no man should cleame to himfelfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becommeth one more excellent than another, but that in common nuture might appeare aboue others the speciall grace of God, which in omitting many, faith openly that it is bound to none. Befide that, God powreth in singular motions, according to the calling of euery man. Of which thing we meete with many examples in the booke of the Judges, where it is said, that the spiritue of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason therefore men followed Saul, whose harts the Lorde had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdome was prophesied of, Samuel said thus: The spiritue of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be another man. And this was continued to the whole course of government: as after it is spoken of David, that the spiritue of the Lorde came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea, in Homer men are said to excell in witte, not onely as Jupiter hath dealt to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased as were most sharpe and deepely witterd, that the wittes of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at euery moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wife, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuerfitie we fee remaining some markes of the Image of God, which doe make difference betweene all mankinde and other creatures.

18. Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdom of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly favour toward vs, wherein our salvation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most witty, are blinder than moles.
I deny not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken; but yet such as doe alwaye favour of a certaine gildie imagination. The Lord gave them in deede, as is above said, a little taste of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodliness: and many times he moued them to speake many things, by confusion whereof themselves might be convinced: But they so faue the things that they faue, that by such seeing they were not directed to the truth, much lesse did attain vnto it, like as a way-faring man in the midst of the field, for a sudden moment, seeth faire and wide the glittering of lightning in the night-time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that he is sooner covered againe with the darknesse of the night, than he can stirre his foote, so faire is it off that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small drops of trueth, wherewith as it were by chuse, they sprinkle their booke, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they nearer so much as smelled that affiruednesse of Gods good will toward vs, without which mans wit must needs be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approacheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to understand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

19 But because we being drunke with a false persuasion of owne deepe in-sight, doe very hardly suffer our selues to be perswaded, that in matters of God it is vitally blinde and dull: I thinke it shall be better to conforme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doth John very well reach in that place which I cuen now alluded, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darknesse, and the darknesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deede, that mans foule is lightened with the brillianc of Gods light, so that it is never altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparkle of it, but yet, that with such a light hee comprehended not God. And why lo? because mans quickenesse of wit, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meerely darknesse. For when the holy ghost calleth men darknes, he at once spoileth them of all abilitie of spirituall understanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloud, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say: flesh is not capable of to high wisdome to conceive God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightned with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall revelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

20 If we were perswaded of this which ought to be out of all controvercie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heavenly father giveth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then heere were no matter to doubt upon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing when he faith, that no man can call Jesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And John Baptizeth seeing the dullnesse of his discipules, crieth out, that no man can receive any thing, vnlesse it be given him from above. And that he meaneth by gift a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, that he complaineth that in so many wordes as he had spoken to commend Christ to his discipules, he prenamed nothing. I see (faith he) that wordes are nothing to informe mens minds concerning divine things, vnlesse the Lord giveth understanding by his spirit. Yea, and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulness, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefit of God. Thine eyes (faith he) have seen those great tokens and woonders, and, The Lord hath not given thee a hart to understande, nor cares to heare, nor cies to see. What should he express more, if hee called vs blockes in considering the worlkes of God? K 3 Whereupon Whereupon the Lord by the Prophet promiseth for a great grace, that he will give the Israelites a heart, that they may know him: signifying thereby, that man is not so much spiritually wise, as is lightened by him. And this Christ plainely confirmed with his owne mouth, when he saith, that no man can come to him, but he whom he shall be gien from the Father. What is not he himselfe the linke of the Father in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed unto vs? Therefore he could not better shewe what our power is to know God, than when he faith, that we have no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Father will unto men? And did he not faithfully do his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inward schoolmaster, the holy Ghost, let open the way to our minde. Therefore none come to him, but they that have heard and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Euen, when the holy Ghost by maruellous and singular vertue formed the cares to heare, and the minde to understand. And leaft that should seeme strange, he alledge the prophesie of Esay, where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shall be gathered together to salvation, shall be taught of the Lord. If God there foreweth some peculiar thing concerning his elect, it is evident that he speaketh not of that kind of learning that was so common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that wee must understand it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy Ghost by his enlightning shall make a new mind. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entering into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisdome of folly and vanité, and vnlerth brought it to nought, at the last conclude thus: that the naturall man cannot perceiue those things that are of the spirit of God: they are foolishnesse vnto him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually judged. Whom doth he call natural? euen him that faideth vpon the light of nature. Hee I say comprehended nothing in the spiritual mysteries of God. Why so? is it because of foolishnesse he neglecteth it? Nay, rather althouh he would strue! never so much, he can do nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually judged. What meaneth that? because being vnterly hidden from the light of man, they are opened by the onely revelation of the spirit: so that they are reckened for folly where the spirit of God giueth not light. Before hee had announced those things that God hath prepared for them that looche him, above the capacitie of eies, cares and minde. Yea, he teefeeth that mans wisdome was as a certaine veile, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God. What meane we? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdome of this world is made folly by God, and shall we forsooth giue vnto it sharpnes of understanding, whereby it may peace to the secret places of the heavenly kingdome? Far be such beastlines from vs.

And so that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he giveth it to God alone. God faith he and the father of glorie, giue to you the spirit of wisdome and revelation. Now thou hearest that all wisdome and revelation is the gift of God. What folowlweth? and lighten the eies of your mind. Surely if they need a new revelation, then are they blind of themselves. It folowlweth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling, &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wis of men are not capable of so great understanding, to know their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedy that dulnes or vnshifflinesse, when by the doctrine of his word he direceth mans vnderstanding, whither without a guide he could not have attayned. For David had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisdome that may bee desired, and yet not contended with that, he requireth to haue his eies opened that he may consider the mysteries. mysteries of the same law. By which speech truly he secretly faith, that the Sunne rileth vpon the earth where the word of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntill he himselfe, that is therefore called the father of lightes, doe give them or open their eyes, bicaufe wherefore he shineth not with his spirite, all things are possiffed with darkenes. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best schoolmater: yet if they had not needed the spirite of truth to instruct their minds in that same doctrine which they had heard before, he would not have hidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we doe thereby confesse that wee want: and God in that that he promiseth it vs, doth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to vnderstand the mysteries of God as hee is inlightned with his grace. He that giueth to himselfe more understanding, is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindeenes.

22. Now remayneth the third point, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which we doe rightly call the knowledge of the works of righteousnesse, wherein mans wit seemeth to be of somewhat more sharpe light, than in the other two before.
For the Apostle teftifieth, that the Gentiles which have no law, while they doe the works of the law, are to themselves in stede of a Law, and doe shew the Law written in their harts, their confeiences bearing them witnesses, and their thoughts accusing them of themselves or excusing them before the judgement of God.
If the Gentiles have righteousnesse naturally graven in their mindes, surely wee cannot say that we are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the Law naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs wene to what purpoce this knowledge of the law is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, how farre it bringeth them towards the marke of reason and truth. The fame is also evident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. He had saide a little before, that they which sinned in the Law, are judg by the Law, they which haue sinned without Law doe perish without Law. Be cause this might seeme unreasonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any judgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in stede of a Law, and therefore is sufficent for their iuft damnation. Therefore the ende of the Law naturall is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shall be def not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently dif cerneth betweene iust and vniust, to take away from men the presence of ignorance, while they are prooued guilie by their owne testimonie. Such is the tendernesse of man toward himselfe, that in doing of euils, he alway turneth away his minde so much as hee may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was mooued to thinke that there is no sinne done but by ignorance. That indeede were sily said of him, if mens hypocrie went so farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it selfe guilie before God. But when the sinner seeking to eschew the judgement imprinted in him, is now and then drawne backe vnto it, and not suffered so to winke, but that he be compelled whether he will or no, sometime to open his eyes: it is falsely said that he sinneth only by ignorance.

23. The mindeis faith more truely, which teacheth vnderstanding is feldome deceived in the generall deining of things, that it is blindnesse when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the especiall cafe. Every man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manslaughter is euill: but he that confirneth to kill his enemies, deliberateth vpon't, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, privately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignor ance, when a man comming to the especiall cafe forgettethe rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the generall question. Of which thing Augustine discusseth very finelie in his exposition of the first verse of the Ivij. Psalme: albeite the same thing

The minde which weakingly blind ly in discerning

Paraphr. lib. 3.
de anma, cap. 46.
Cap.2. Of the knowledge of

is not continually. For sometime the shamefulnesse of the cuill deed, doth preseth the conscience, that not deceiving himselfe, nor false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly and willingly he runneth into cuill. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better and allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me thinke, Aristotles hath verie aptly made distinction between Incontinence and intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he faith, that there by reason of troubled affection or pasion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the cuill in his owne act, that generally feeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of cuinn, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceived choice of cuill.

23. Now when thou hearest judgement univerally named in the difference of good and cuill, thinke it not every found and perfect judgement. For if mens harts are furnished with choice of right and vniuift, openly to this ende, that they should not pretend ignorance, it is not then needfull to see the truth in every thing. But it is enough and more, that they understand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being convinced by witnesse of their conscience, they even now already begin to tremble at the judgement seat of God. And if we will trye our reason by the law of God, which is the examplar of righteousnesse, we shall finde how many wails it is blinde. Truly it attainteth not al to those that are the chief things in the Fifth table, as of confidence in God, of giving to him the praise of strength and righteousnesse, of calling upon his name, of the true keeping of Sabatt. What soule ever by naturall sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these and like things? For when prophane men will worship God although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alwaye slide backe thither againe.
They denie in deed that sacrifices doe please God, vniuist tharre be adoined a purenesse of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceive somewhat of the spirituall worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false conceptions. For it can never be perwaded them, that all is true that the lawe prescribeth of it. Shall I say, that that wit excellenth in any sharp understanding, which can neither of it selfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commandements of the Second table it hath some more understanding, by so much as they came nearer to the preference of cuill fellehship among men. Albeit even herein also it is found many times to faile. To euer excellent nature it seemeth most unreasonabile, to suffer an vniuift, and too imperious a manner of governeing over them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the judgement of men reason is none other, but that it is the part of a serene and base couraige, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the part of an honest end free borne hart, to flake it off. And reuenge of injuries is reckenned for no fault among the Philosophers. But the Lord condemning that too much noblesse of couraige, commendeth his to keepe the same patience that is soill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our understanding marketh not concupisencce at all. For a natural man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the deceas of his desires. The light of nature is choaked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of minde for faultes, they meane those motions that appear and shew forth themselves by groffe tokens; but they make no account of those cuill desires that doe gently tickle the minde.

25. Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all stinnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be rejected, which teach that pur-poused malice and howardnesse is vied in all stinnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is ourselueth with so many forces of being deceived, is subiect to so many errors, stumbleth at so many flayes,
God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 69

friues is entangled with so many straites, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lord in all parts of our life, Paul sheweth when hee faith, that we are not sufficient to thinke any thing of our selves, as of our selues. He speaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that wee should not thinke that it can come in our minde how any thing is to be done well, Is our diligence, insight, understanding and heede so corrupted, that it can deceive or thinke upon nothing that is right before the Lord? that feemeth too hard to vs, that do unwittingly suffer our selues to be spoiled of the sharpeness of reason, which wee account a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that all the invention of mans hart is onely cuill. If all that our wit conceived, demeh upon purpose & goeth about, is alway cuill, how can it come in our minde to purpose that which pleath God, to whom onely holiness and righteousses is acceptable? So is it to be seen, that the reason of our minde, which waie focuer it turne it selfe, is miserable subject to vanitie. David knewe this weakeuenesse in himselfe, when he prayed to have understanding giuen him, to learne the Lords commandements aright. For hee certeine faith therein, that his own vit sufficeth him not, which desirh to have a newe giuen him. And that not onely once, but almost ten times, in one Pslam, he repeath the same prayer. By which repeating he priuily declareth, with how great need he is driven to praiie it. And that which he prayeth for himselfe alone: Paul commonly vieth to praiie for the Churches. Wee ceafe not (faith he) to praiie for you, and to desire that yee may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisdome and spirituall understanding, that yee may walke worthy of God, &c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that he doth withall teloth, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledged this default of reason to understand those things that are of God, that hee thinketh the grace of illumination to bee no little necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eies. And not content with that, hee addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lift vp our eies to see the light: but the eies of our minde lie shut, vnderright the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterwarde be by themselves: for that which I even now allaged out of Paul, belongeth to continuall proceedings & encreasings. And this doth David expressly let out in these words: With my whole hart have I sought thee, make me not to inuare from thy commandements. For when he had beene regenerate, and had not flenderly profited in true godlines, yet hee confesseth, that for every moment he needeth continuall direction, least hee should siyarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in another place he prayeth to have the right spirit renewed, which he had lost by his owne fault, because it belongeth to the same God to restore vnto vs the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

Nowe is will to be examined, wherein staddeth the chief libertie of free choice, for it hath benne alreadye scene, that choice doth rather belong to will, than to understanding. First, what this thing which the Philosophers have taught, and is received with common consent, that is, that all things by natural inclination desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to the viuities of mans will: let vs mark that the force of free will, is not to be considered in such appetit, as rather proceedeth of the inclination of the affections than of the adulatement of the understanding. For even the schoolmen doe confesse, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selue to objects, whereby they mean that the object of appetit must be such as may be subject to choice, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choice. And truely if a man consider what is the natural desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is commont to him with beastes. For they also desire

Touching the will of man, the general inclination which is hath to that good whereof Philosophers do so much talk, produceth not any freedom or habiliteit of desiring and offering vnto vs, without the motion of the holy ghost.
Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of
to be well, and when any shew of good appeareth that moueth their senses, they follow it. But man doth neither chose by reason, that he may follow with diligence that thing which is indeed good for him, according to the excellency of his immortal nature, nor taketh reason to counsell, but without reason, without counsell, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedom of will, if a man by sense of nature be carried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he desire good by right reason, and when he hath knowne it, that he chuse it, & when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But leaft any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophistical argument. For appetite is not here called the proper manner of will, but a natural inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or justice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do never so much desire to attain that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternal blessedness is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspireth unto it, but by the mouing of the holy Ghost. Wherefore the natural desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to procure the freedom of will, no more than in mettals and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other things, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euil: or whether it keepeth still anie parcell vnhurt, from whence do grow good desires.

27 They that doe attribute to the first grace of God, that wee will effectually, steme on the other side to faie secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it sefle to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it cannot grow to a perfect affection, or raife vp any endeavor. And there is no doubt that the Schoolmen have commonly embrase this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the old writers: forasmuch as they are wont to confider man in pure natural things, (as they terme it,) such a one as the Apostle described him in these worde: I do not the good that I would, but the euill that I would not, that I doe. To will is present vnto mee, but to performe it I find not. But after this manner is the discourse that Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully perverted. For he receaveth of the Christian wrestling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galatians) which the faithfull continually feele within themselves, in the battell betweene the flesh and the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, that when he had saide, that there dwelleth no goodnes in him, he addeth an expostion, that he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore hee, that he is not he that doth the euill, but finne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, my flesh? Even as much as if he had saide thus: God dwelleth not in me of my selfe, for there is no good to bee founde in my flesh. Hereupon followeth that maner of excuse: I my selfe do not the euill, but finne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the chiefe part of their soule tende vnto good. Now, the conclusion that is adoyned after, declareth all this matter euidently. I am delited (faith he,) with the law, according to the inward man: But I see another lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a straining in himselfe, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God, carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, where as once he had thought, that that had beene spoken of the nature of man, revoked his expostion as false, and all agreeing together. And truely, if we allow this, that men without grace have some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we answere to the Apostle which faith, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall wee answere to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that euery intention of mans hart is onely euill? Wherefore if they have stumbles by false taking of one place, there is no cause why wee shoulde
The iij. Chapter.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.

But man cannot be any way better knowne in either part of his soule, than if hee come foorth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If he be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is safe to proue, then is he proued to bee a very miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimic against God, and so is not subject, nor can be subject to the lawe of God. Is Rom.8.6. flesh so perverse, that with all her affection shee continually strive enimic against God? that she cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the lawe of God? Finally, that she can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Now, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the words of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. Hec John,3.6: commandeth not to be borne againe according to the bodie. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doth the comparison, set in both places, conforme. For the spirit is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we have nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoever we have of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we could have any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paul, where after he had described the olde man, whom he had saide to be corrupt with concupiscences of error, hee biddeth vs to bee renewed in the sprite of our minde: you see he doth not place unlawfull and cull lustes onely in the sensuall part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shew that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and perverted: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in understanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindness of their hart: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the righteousnesse both of his weddome and justitie: which is also made more plane by the comparison by and by.

adioynted, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they have not so learned Christ. For of these wordes we gather, that the grace of Christ, is the onely remedie whereby we are deluered from that blindness, and the evils that ensue thereof. For so had I say also prophesied of the languing of Christ, when he promised, that the Lord should be an everlaasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse covered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he teftifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkenesse and blindnesse. I will not reheare particularly such things as are written every where, specially in the Pfalms and in the Prophetes against the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that David zryteth, If he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall bee vainer than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a greeuous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifling, madde and puerile.

2. No eaiser is the condemnation of the hart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse above all things: but because I study to be short, I will be content with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein we may behold the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throwe downe the arroganctie of mankinde, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that vnderstandeth or that seeketh God. All are gone out of the way, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throat is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poysone of Serpents is vnder their lips, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: whose feete are swift to shedde bloud, in whose waies is sorrow and vnhappiness, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes. With these thunderboltes hee inueth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sonsnes of Adam. Neither declaimeth he against the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to teach rather that all men are opprressed with calamitie, impossible to bee overcome, from which they cannot get vp againe, vnlesse they bee plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not be prooued vnlesse it had beene by the overthrowe and destruction of nature, hee brought forth these testimonies whereby is prooued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they be here described, not onely by fault of enim custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument cannot stande, that there is no saluation for man but by the mercie of God, because he is in himselfe vertely lofte and past hope. I will not here butt my selfe in proouing the applying of these testimonies that no man shoulde thinke them vnjustly vfed. I will to take them as if they had beene first spoken by Paul, and not taken out of the Prophetes. First he taketh away from man righteouneffe, that is integritie and pureneffe, and then vnderstanding. The want of vnderstanding, hee prooueth by Apoftaleis departing from God, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisdome. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. He saith further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doeth good, and then hee adoyneth the haynous faults, wherewith they defile their members that are once let loose into wickednesse. Last of all he teftifieth that they are void of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should have beene directed. If these be the inherittible gifts of mankinde, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I grant that not all these faults doe appeare in every man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the harts of all men. For as the body while it already froueth enclosed within it, the caufe and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot cannot be called healthie: no more can the soule be reckoned sound, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all pointes. For in the body be it never so much diseased, there remaineth a quicknes of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulf of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether void of all goodness.

3 The same question in a manner which hath beene before asfoyled, now riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there have been some, which by guiding of nature have beene bent to vertue in all their life. And I regard it not, though many flippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the verie studie of honesty they have shewed a prooue, that there was some pureneffe in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merits of worke, yet we must somwhat speake in this place: so far as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that we should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her instruction som men have not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselves most honestly. But here we must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restraine it. For if the Lord would suffer the minde of all men as it were with loose reins to runne wildlie into all sortes of lustes, without doubt there woulde be no man, but he woulde in plaine experience make vs beleue, that all those euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truely saide of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose seete are swift to shed bloud, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throats like vnto open sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lips venemous, their worke vprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruerfes, whose eies are bent to entrapings, their hearts lift vp dippes and caulfe to triumph over other, and all the parts of them applied to infinite mifcheues. If euerie soule be subject to all such monsters, as the Apothle boldlie pronounceth, truely we see what woulde come to passe, if the Lorde woulde suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beaft that is so headlong carried away, there is no freeme bee it neuer so swift and strong, whereof the overflouing is so violent. The Lorde health these diseases in his elect by this means that we will by and by fet forth. In some he ouerlie restraine them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so faire as he foreseeth to be expedient for preferring of the universtie of things. Whereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not froth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vnpleasantes. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sorte aspire towarse it. Some rise vp aboue the common sort, that by their maiesties they may keepe othere in their dutie. So God by his prudence bridleth the peruerfes of nature, that it breake not froth into dooings, but he cleneth it not within.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolved. For either we must make Camillus like unto Catilina, or else in Camillus we shall have an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodness. I grant indeede that those goodlie gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme woorthie to be commended, if they be wayed by themselves, but how shall they be proues of natural goodness in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sort? If a naturall man excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is undoubtedly not without power toward the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and following anie thing rather than vpright vprightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you grant that.

Rom. 3.10.
Of the knowledge of

that he was a natural man. Now what power of man's nature to goodness will you rehearse vnto me in this behalfe, if in the greatest shew of purenesse it be founde that he is alwayes carried to corruption? Therefore, leaft yee commend a man for vertue, whoeuer vices deceit you vnder vertues Image, do not to giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne peruerse. Albeit this is a more sure and easie solution of this question, that there are not common gifts of nature, but special graces of God, which he diuerifie and to a certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vngodlie. For which reason wee feare not in common speech to call one man well naureed, and another of euil nature, yet wee cease not to include them both vnder the vniversall state of mans corruption, but we shewe what special grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which he hath not vouchsafed to giue to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him a neweman. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, faied that Kings sonnes are created notable by some singular make, because God providing for mankinde, furnieth these with a princely nature whome hee appointeth to bear government: & out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renowned in histories. The same is also to be thought of private men. But because as every man hath most exceded, so his ambition hath most moued him forwarde (with which spot all vertues are defiled; so that they looke all favour before God) it is to be accounted nothing woorth, whatsoever seemeth praiue woorthie in vngodlie men, because of the chiefe part of virtuynesse faileth, where there is no studie to advance the glose of God, which all they want whome hee hath not regenerate with his spirit. Neither is it vainelie spoken in Esaie, that vpon Christ refeth the spirithe of the fear of God, whereby we are taught, that so manie as are strange from Christ are without the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdome. As for the vertues that decrease vs vs with vauncie shewe, I grant they shall have praiue in the court of policie; and in the common fame of men, but before the heavenly judgement fteate, they shall be of no value to deuerie rightcousnes.

§ With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is detaine, it cannot once muoue it felse to goodnesse, much leffe applicit felse. For such mouing is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremie praieth to the Lord to turne him, if he will have him turned. Whereupon the prophet in the fame Chapter, describing the spirituall redemption of the faithfull people, faith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with how straite fetteth a finner is bound so long as being forskaten of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Duell. Yet Will still remaineth, which with most bent affeccon is both enclined and hasteth to sinne. For man was not depraied of Will when he did call him felse into this necessitie, but of the soundnesse of Will.
And Bernard faith not vnaply, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simplice to Will is the worke of man: to Will cuill of corrupt nature: to Will well of grace. Nowe, whereas I sauie, that Will put from libertie is by necessitie drawne out into cuill, it is maruell if that should feme a hard speeche vnto any man, which neither hath any abfurditie in it, nor varieth from the virtue of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene necessitie and compulsion. But if a man ake them, is not God of ne-cessitie good? is not the diuell of necessitie cuill? what can they answer? For so is goodnes knytt with Gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessitie that he be God than that he be good. And the diuell is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnes, that he can do nothing but cuill. But now if any robber of God doe barke against this and saie, that God deserueth small praiue for his goodnesse, which he is compelled to kepe: shall not this bee a readie answer to him, that it commeth to passe by his infinite

infinite goodness and not by violent impulsio, that he cannot doe euill. Therefore if this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the diuell which cannot doe but euill yet willingly, who shall then lay that a man doth therefore leffe willingly sinne for this that he is subiect to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine each where speaketh of it, even then also when he was eminently preffed with the caullation of Celestius, he fllicked not to affirme in these wordes, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but now the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as he falleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kept, that man since he is corrupted, sinne in deed willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a moff bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne luft, and not by forraine constraint: but yet of such peculiaritie of nature as he is, he cannot but be moued and driven to euill. If this be true, then surely it is plainly expreffed that he is subiect to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine writeth thus, onely man among all luing creatures is free: and yet by meanes of sinne, he also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that even thereby also he shoulde be deprived of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And alittle after, will being changed in itself into worse, by I wor not what corrupt and manuells manner, so maketh necessitie that very necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot execute will, and will for as much as it is drawn by allurement, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine manner willing. Afterward he faith that we are preffed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will we are exccuslable, because will when it was free, made it felfe the bondfeuan of sinne. At length he concludes, that the soule is so after a certaine maruellous and euill manner holden both a bond sante and free, under this certaine willing and all free necessitie: a bondeuant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more marvellous and more miserable, therein guiltie where in it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truly the readers doe perceiue that I bring no new thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the contenf of all godly men, and almost a thouand yeares after was kept ffull in monkes Clystiers. But Lombard when he could not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gave matter to a permissional error.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what maner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For where as the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which we want, when we shall knowe what his worke is in vs, it will straight way appeare on the other side what is our neede. When the Apostle faith to the Philippians, that hee trusteth that he which began a good worke in them, will performe it into the day of Jesus Christ: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, he meaneth the very beginning, of conversion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stirring vp in our harts the love, desire and endeavoure of righteousness, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our harts to righteousness he endeth it in continuing vs to perfection. And that no man shoule cauill that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of itself weak is helpen: the holy Ghost in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnconvinced. I will giue you (faith he) a new hart. I will put a new spirit in the middes of you. And I will take away the former hart from your flesh, and I will giue you a hart of flesh. And I will put my spirit in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commandements. Who shall say that the weakeuenes of mans will is strengthened strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aspire to the choice of that that is good, when it must be wholly transformed and renewed? If there be any godnesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed every way, then will I grant that the hart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, be supplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to shew by this similitude, that no godnesse could ever be wrong out of our hart vnleffe it be made throughly new: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which he challengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into flesh, when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. If that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the composition of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an euill will into a good. And this I affirme to be wholly done by God, because we are not able so much as to think, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in another place he faith, that God doth not onely helpe our weake will, or amende our peruerse will, but that he worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is easily gathered, that which I faide before, that whatsoever good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace. In which sense in another place he faith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there intreate of the vniuerse gauernement, but giueth vs to God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in saying, all, truely he maketh God the author of spiritual life, even from the beginning to the ende. Which I faie same thing he had taughe before in other words, sauing that the faithfull are of God in Christ, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is destroyed. For there is to be vnderstond a comparision betwene Adam and Christ, which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he teacheth that we are the worke of God created in Christ to good works, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to proue, that our salvation is of free gift, because the beginning of all godnesse is at the second creation, which we obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our felues, were it never fo small, we should have also some portion of merite. But he to proue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we have desuerted nothing, because we are create in Christ to good works, which God hath prepared. In which words he signifieth againe, that all partes of good works even from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had saide in the Psalm that we are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, We made not our selues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spiritual life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now how he not contented simpy to haue gien to God the praise of our salvation, doth expressly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as he would say, that there resteth no pece, be it never fo little, for man to glory in, because it is all of God.

7 But there be some peraduenture that will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature turned away from good, is converted by the onely power of the Lord: but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before every good worke, but so, that will doth accompanie it and not leade it, as a waiting maidie after it, and not a foreroger. Which thing being not euill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth disorderly writhe to this purpose. But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue allege, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signifieth, that the Lorde doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putte in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is prevented by grace, in that respect I giue you leave leue to call it a walking maid: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lord, that is wrongfully given to man that he doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Christ's stone, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well it selfe, as even now we have seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the walking maid of grace, to assigne unto her a certaine second office in dooing a good worke, but because this only was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principall cause of salvation in mans desiring: therefore he stoode only vpon this point, that grace was before all desiring: which was sufficient for the matter that he then had in hand, not medling in the meantime with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handlepeth. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doth prevent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, he maketh him altogether the whole author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguing vpon them. Men (faith hee) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expound that sayeing of Christ, Every one that hath heard of my father commeth to mee, he faith: Free will is so holpen not onely that it may know what is to be done, but also may do it when it hath knowne it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by the grace of the spirit, he so teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not only see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

And because we are now in hande with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs go forward and prooue the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, lest any man should accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let vs shew that the truth which we affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimonie of this holy man, I meanie Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most choisen that shall be brought forth, the way may be prepared to vnderstand all that are here and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shall not be vaine done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthy the consent of godly men doth much effeeme. Surely, it is evident by plaine and certaine proofe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where els but onely from God, for there cannot be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also another reason not unlike unto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be seene whene faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when we, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lord, when he nameth these two things in the conversion of his people, to take away from them a fetiche hart, and to give them a hart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must be done away, that we may be converted to righteousnesse: and that whatsoever commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he vtereth not this in one place only. For he faith in Jeremie: I will give them one hart and one way, that they may feare me all their daies. And a little after, I will give the feare of my name into their hart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I will give them one hart.

hart, and I will give a new spirit in their bowels. I will take away the stony hart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh. Hee could not more evidently claim to himselfe, and take from vs whatsoever is good and right in our will, then when he declareth that our conversion is a creation of a new spirit, and of a new hart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

And so read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde encline our hart to him (faith Salomon) that we may keepe his commandements. He showeth the unwaresome of our heart which naturally reioyceth to rebell against the Law of God if it be not bowed. And the same thing is in the Psalme: Lord incline my heart to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the peruerse motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obstinacie, and this correction whereby it is lead to obedience. When David feeling himselfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new hart within him, to renew a right spirit within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the parts of his heart are full of vncompassed, and his spirit bereft with crooked peruerse motion? and in calling the compassed spirit which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doeth he not attribute it wholly to God? But any man take exception and say, that the verie prayer is a token of a godly and holy affectation: our answer is readie, that though David were by that time somewhat come to amendment, yet doeth he still compare his hart (at least that forefull fall that hee had felt. Therefore taking vpon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause prayeth to have gien him all these things that God gieeth to his elect in regeneration. And so being like a dead man, he will what himselfe to bee created of new, that of the bondslaves of Satan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Marvellous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is resting from our owne works, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne works farewell, to give due place to the works of God. If sluggishly hindereth not, Christ hath given testimonie evident enough of his graces to make them notto be enviously supprest. I am (faith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot bear fruit of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in me. For without me you can doe nothing. If we beare fruit none otherwise than a branch budeth being plucked out of the ground and without moisture: we neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can do nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our felues: but in bringing vs to nothing, hee excludeth all opinion of power be it never so little. If we being graffed in Christ, beare fruit like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of hervines both from the moisture of the earth, and from the dew of heaven, and from the cherishing of the sun: Ife nothing remaine for vs in doing a good works, if we keepe whole for God that which is his. The sonde futile dullewe is allaged in vaine, that there is juice alreadie enclosed within the branch, and a certaine power to bring forth fruit, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first 100te, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christ doth meane nothing else, but that wee are a drie thicke and nothing worth, when we be feuered from him, because by our felues being separate, we have no power to do well: as also in another place he faith: Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted shall be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole vnto him in the place alreadie allaged. It is God (faith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe. The first part part of a good work is will: the second is a strong inducement in doing it: the Author of both is God. Therefore we steal it from God, if we take to our selves anything, either in will or in effectual working. If it were false that God doth help or weakness will, then somewhat were left for us. But when it is false that he maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of us. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh, that it cannot be vp: He said further, that to overcome the hardiness of that battle, there is ministered unto us strength of end, even to the elect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein we have before taught that the whole course of spiritual life is comprehended. For which reason, David, after he had prayed to have the waies of the Lord opened unto him, that he might walk in his truth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my hart to fear thy name. In which words he signifies, that even they that are well minded, are subject to so many withdrawals of mind, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had prayed to have his steppes directed to keep the word of God, he requireth also to have strength given him to fight. Let not any iniquity (faith he) beare rule over me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin and end a good work in vs: that it may all be his works, that will conuince a loue of that which is right, that it is enuiled to the desire thereof, that it is starded vp and moued to endeavoure of following it. And that then our choice, desire, and endeavoure faint not, but doe proceed even to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

10. And he moueth the will, not in such sort as hath in many ages been taught and beleueth: that it is afterward in our choice, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthening it. Therefore that must be rejected which Chrysostome so oft repeacheth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his side. We grant that such was the state of man while he yet stood, that he might bow to either part. But if we haue taught by his example how miserable is free will, vnlesse God both will and can in vs: what shall become of vs, if he giveth us his grace according to that small proportion? But rather we doe obscure and extenuate it with our unhappinesse. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good will is offered vs, if we doe accept it, but that he will performe it in vs: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his Spirit both direct, bow and government our hart, and reigneth in us, as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezekiel, that he will give to the elect a new spirit only for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commandements, but to make them walke in deed. Neither can Christ the Saviour, (Every one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectual of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchsafeth not to giue to all men generally without regard, as that saying (as I thinke) of Oecam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what list in him. Men are in deed to be taught that God's goodnesse is laid open for all men, without exception that seeketh for it. But forasmuch as they onely beginne to seek for it, whom the heavenly grace hath breathed upon, so much as the little peace ought to be plucked away from his praiseth. Truely this is the prerogative of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirit of God, they are moued and governed by his guiding. Therefore Augustine doth worthyly as well mocke them, that claim an parte of willing to themselves, as her doe reprehende other which thinke, that that is generally giuen to all men, which is the speciall testimony of free election. Nature (faith he) but not Aug de verbis, grace, is common to all men. Calling it a bricke subtile of witte like glassie, that Apuld. Ser. 11.

I came (iackest thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why sweleest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is gien thee? 11 Of continuance there should no more doubt have beene made, but that it should have beene taken for the free gift of God vnliefe the most wicked errour had grown in force, that it is distributed according to the deserts of men, as every man hath shewed himselfe not vnhankfull to the first grace. But forasmuch as this error had grownen upon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or rec tee the grace of God offered, that opinion being driven away, this other doth also fall of itselfe. Albeit heretofor they erre two manner of ways. Beside that this they that teach that our thankfulness towards the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof is rewarded with the latter gifts: they add disjointly, that now grace alone doth not work in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the first this we ought to believe, that the Lord while he daily enricheth and heareth his servants with new gifts of his grace, because he lieth and fauoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestowe greater graces. And heretofor those sayings, To him that hath, shall be given.

Againe: Oh, good servant, because thou haft beene faithfully in few things, I will set thee over many. But here two things are to be taken heed of, that neither the lawfull vse of the first grace be said to be rewarded with the later graces, nor be so counted a rewarding, that it ceafe to be reckoned the free grace of God. I grant therefore, that this blesing of God is to bee looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they have vsed the first graces, they shall be enlarged with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they vse no lesse wrongfull than unhappily that old de finition of working and together working grace. Augustine vse the same in deed, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth end that which in working he beganeth, and that it is still the same grace but changed name, according to the diuers maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that hee doth not part betweene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but onely noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many gifts of God doe goe before the good will of man, among the which the felle same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he teacheth nothing, that it may cleave to it selfe. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had laid that it is God, which worketh in vs both to will and to performe, he by and by addeth that hee doth them both of his good will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnes. Whereas they are wont to say, that after we have once giuen place to the first grace, our owne iudgments do now work together with the grace that followeth. To this I answer: If they mean that we, after we have beene once by the power of the Lord broken to the obedicence of righteousness, doe of owr owne accord goe forwarde, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certain, that there is such a readiincle of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence commeth

And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I have labored, more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it for, that because it might seem somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so, that he called himselfe a worker together with grace. It is manuell that so many which otherwise were not cull men, have humbled at this strawe. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partner of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away all the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (faith he) that haue labored, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulnesse of the speech deceived them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Grecke article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him was the worker of all: And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkely, though shortly, where he thus faith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: His mercy hath prevented me: And his mercy shall follow me. It preueneth man not willing, to make him will: and it followeth him willing, that he will not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church. Ser. 2. in Cant. speaking thus: Draw me in a maner vnwilling, that thou maist make me willing: draw me lying slothfull, that thou maist make me runne.

Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne words, leaff the Pelagians of our charge, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, shoule as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whom long agoe Augustine was drawn forth into the same contention. In his booke of Correction and grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will reheare shortly, but yet doe it in his owne words: that to Adam was given the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to vs is given will, and by will to overcome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is given both to will and to able. That the first libertie was to bee able noto to finne, ours is much greater, not to be able to finne. And leaff he should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortallitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a little after hee plucketh out this doubt. For (faith he) the will of holy men is so much handled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so will: they therefore will, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weakness, in which yet behooueth the power to be made perfect, for represing of pride, their owne will were left unto them, that by the helpe of God they may if they will, and God doth not worke in them to will: then among so many temptations will should needs fall downe for weakness, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is not our grace, to the weakness of mans will, that it should be moued without swarting or feuing by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint how weak soever it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our harts doe of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he faith, that the Lord doth draw men in deede with their owne wils, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now have we that thing testified by Augstines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onlye offered by God to be received or refused at every mans Free election.
election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election and will in the heart: so that euerie good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his words out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euerie good worke in vs.

14 But whereas he faith in another place, that wil is not taken away by grace, but from an evil will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: the meaneth only that man is not so drawn, that without any motion of heart he is carried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus unto Boniface: We know that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whom it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merits of worke, nor according to the merits of will, but of free favour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the just judgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the fame Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen to the deferings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselves worthy. For he will have Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessarie to vs for euerie of our doings, and is not giuen in recompense to worke, that it may be grace in deed. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter sentence, than out of the first Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Repretion and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by libertie, but libertie by grace: and thir by the fame grace, by affection of desire printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with invincible force: that while grace governeth, it neuer falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbleth downe. That by the free mercie of God both is converted to good, and being converted abided in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and the direction of another direction, hangeth upon the owne wil of God, and not vpon any merit of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we lett it to call it, as he will write of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

How God worketh in the hearts of men.

I T is sufficiently prooved, as I thinke, that man is so holden captive with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor travauell by endeavours to goodnesse: because that, wee have rehearsed a distinction betweene compulsion and necessitie, whereby it might appeare, that when he sinneth of necessitie, yet notwithstanding hee sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subject to bondage to the Diuell, he semeth rather to be lead by the diuels will than his owne, it resteth now to be declared of what sort are both kinde of working. And then is this question to be alloeved, whether in euerie worke there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some working of his. In one place Augustine compariseth mans will to a horse, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the diuell he compariseth to riders. If God (faith he) fitte vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, governeth it temperately, spurreth it forward if it be too slow, plucketh it backe if it be too quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse and wildnesse of it, tamest the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Diuell have polisshed it, he like a foolishe and wanton rider, violent ly carrieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe flipe places, spurreth it forwarde to stubbornnesse and fearnesse: which unlimitedly wee will for this time be contented with,
But I. The grace, howe, therewith, thereupon, are not to be commanded: but that being bewitched with the deceits of Satan, it of necessity yieldeth itself obedient to every leading of him. For whom the Lord vouchefaught not to rule with his spirit, them by just judgement he fenth away to be moued of Satan. Wherefore the Apostle sayeth, that the God of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers ordained to destruction, that they should not see the light of the Gospel. And in another place: That he worketh in the disobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deede that follow thereupon, are called the works of Satan, of which yet the cause is not to be fought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the roote of euill, wherein resteth the foundation of the kingdom of Satan, which is sinne.

2. But farre other is the order of God's doing in such things. And that the same may appear more certainly to us, let the hurt done to the holy man Job by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his hearde, and like enemies in war, drove away his cattell for booties. Now is then wicked deed plainly seene, and in that worke Satan is not idle, from whence the Historie saith, that all this did proceed. But Job himself did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, where he saith, that he have taken away from him those things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we refer the selfe same worke to God, as Author, to Satan as Author, and to man as Author of it, but that we must either excue Satan by the company of God, or report God to be the Author of euill? Very easily: if first we looke upon the end, why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamity to exercise the patience of his servant: The euill goeth about to drive him to despair. The Chaldees against right and law, seeke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diuersitie in purposes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the manner of doing there is no selfe diuersitie. The Lord leaueth his servant to Satan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to excite it, he did leave and deliver him to be driven to it. Satan with his venomous things, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of themselves to doe that mischief: they furiously run to doe wrong, and doe binde and deifie all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly saith, that Satan doth worke in the proboate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdom, that is to say, the kingdom of wickednes. It is also saide that God worketh in them after his manner, because Satan himselfe, forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandement, turneth himselfe hither and thither to execute his Iust judgements. I speake not here of Gods vnieurs all moueing, whereby as all creatures are suffeted, so from thence they take their effectual power of doing any thing. I speake onely of that speciall doing, which appeareth in every special act. We see therefore that it is no absurdity, that one selfe act be ascribed to God, to Satan, and to man: but the diuersitie in the end and manner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the Iustice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednes of Satan and man be waryeth it selfe to their reproch.

3. The olde writers in this point also, are sometime precisely afraid, simply to confess the truth, because they feare lest they should so open a window to wickednes, to speake reverently of the worke of God. Which I obiect as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing dangerous, if we simply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himselfe sometime was not free from the superstition, as where he saith, that hardning and blinding, pertaineth not to the worke of God, but to his fore knowledge. But the phrases of Scripture allow not these futilities, which phrases doe plainly

shew that there is therein somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himselfe in his fift booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long piece to prove that sins are not onely of the permission or sufferance of God, but also of his power; that so former sinnes might be punished. Likewise, that which they bring forth, concerning permission, is too weake to stand. It is oftentimes said, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, and moveth their harts as I have else where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is never expressed, if we flee to free foreknowledge or sufferance. Therefore we answere that it is done after two manners. For first, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkness and blindness; whereas when his spirit is taken away, our harts waxe hard and become stony: whereas when his direction ceaseth, they are wrested into crookedness, it is well said that he doth blind, harden, and bow them from whom he taketh away the power to see, obey & do rightly. The second manner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his judgements by Sathan the minister of his wrath, he both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth vp their wils, and strengtheneth their endeavours. So when Moses reheareseth that king Sennacherib did not give paffage to the people, because God had hardened his spirit, and made his hart obdurate, he by and by adioyneth the end of his purpose: that he might (faith he) give him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods will to have him destroyed, the making of this hart obdurate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4. After the first manner this seemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of truth; and taketh away reason from the Elders. He taketh the hart away from them that are set over the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Against, Lord, why hast thou made vs mad, and hardened our hart, that we should not hear thee? Because they judge rather of what for God maketh men by forsaking them, than how he performeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharaoh. I will harden the hart of Pharaoh, that he do not heare you, and let the people go. Afterward he faileth, that he hath made heavy and hardened his hart. Did he harden it, in not sustaining it? That is true in deed: but he did somewhat more, that he committed his hart to Sathan to be confirmed with obstinacie. Whereupon he had before said: I will hold his hart. The people went out of Egypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth and met them like enemies. By whom were they stirred vp? Truly Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lord that had hardened their harts. And the Prophet reciting the same historie, saith, that he turned their harts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stumbled being left without the counsel of God. For if they be hardened and turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. Moreover so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressours of the people, how did he performe his work in the reprobate? so as a man may see, that the effectuall of working was in him, and they openly did seruice as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to intangle them, and sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed and driven by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not answere appoint it after this sort: that in as much as they sin, it is their owne: in as much as in hinnynge they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that deuided the darknes as pleaseth him.

5. Now that the ministerie of Sathan is vied to pricke forwarde the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his providence appointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proved, though it were but by one place only. For it is oftentimes said, in Samuel, that the cruel spirit of the Lord, & an evil spirit from the Lord, did either violently carry carrie or leave Saul. To say that this spirit was the holy Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the uncleane spirit is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his commandement and power, being rather his instrument in doing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacy of errour and deceiving is sent by God, that they which have not obeyed the truth, may beleue lies. But there is always a great difference in one selfe same worke, betweene that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan and the wicked go about. He maketh the euill instruments that he hath vnder his hand, and may turne whether he list to serue his libertie. They, in as much as they are euill, do bring forth in effect the wickednes that they have conceived by corruptnesse of nature. The rest of such things as serue for to deluere the children of God from slander, and to cut off all shifting from the wicked, are alreadie set forth in the Chapter concerning Providenc. For in this placemy purpose was onely to shew how Satan reigneth in the reprobrate man, and how God worketh in them both.

6 Although we have before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those dooings, which are neither just nor faultie of themselues, and belong rather to the body then to the spirittual life. Some in such things have graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not sinne about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certain to prooue the same thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confesse that they which do hold that they have no power to righteousnesse, do holde the thing that is principally necessary to salvation: yet I do think that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the special grace of the Lorde, to ope it in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth thereunto: againe, so oft as our wit and minde ethcheth that which else would have hurt vs. And the force of Gods providence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shall foresee to be expedient, but also to make the wils of men to tend thereunto. Truely, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, we shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shall give credito to many testimonies, which euer that the Lord eth in those things also rule the hartes of men, they shall compell vs to yeelde our will subject to the speciall mouing of God. Who did procure the good wils of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lend them all their most precious jewels? They would never have found in their hartes to have done of their owne accord. Therefore their wils were more subject to the Lord, then ruled by themselves. And truly if Jacob had not been persuaded that God put into men divers affections as pleasaunt him, he would not have faide of his sonne Joseph, whom he thought to be some Hebrew. Egyptians; God grant you to finde mercie before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Pfalme, that when it pleased God to have mercie upon it, he meekened the hartes of the cruel nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that hee prepared him to warre, the caufe is expressed, for that the spiritt of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolomes minde, from embracing the counsell of Achithophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to bee persuaded with the young mens advice? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the comming of Israel? Truely, the harlot Rehabeam confesseth, that it was done by God. Againe, who threwe downe the hartes of Israel with dread and fearefulness, but hee that in the lawe threatened that he would give them a fearefull hart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things vnusuallly ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooued that which I affirm, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his providence, even in outward things doth bowe and turne the wils of

Not onely in spirittual, but in the administration even of outward things, is the speciall mouing of God, that maketh his creatures answer vs in our desires in doing of good, or turning evil away from vs.

Daily experience may presente anis that in common outward things the freedome of men, and that their choice is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule over the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather upon the mouing of God, than upon the freedome of thine owne choice, this daily experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy judgement and wit oft faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage faileth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present advent is offered thee: in things great and perilous, thou haft a courage overcomming all difficulty. And so do I expound that which Salomon faith: That the care may heare, that the eye may see, the Lorde worketh both. For I take it that he speake not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of ving them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hande and boweth whether he will the hart of the king as the streames of waters: trueth under the example of one speciall fort, he comprehended the whole generalitie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preemiynce principally belongeth to the will of a king, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the wils of other: but if the will of the king be ruled with the hand of God, no more shal our will be exempted from the same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustin: The Scripture if it be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good wils of men which he of euill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doth direct to good doonings and to eternall life, but also these wils that preferre the creature of the world, are so in the power of God, that he maketh them to be inclined whither hee will and when he will, either to doe benefitts, or to execute punishments, by a judgement most secret indeed, but the same most righteous.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans wil is not to be weyed by the successe of things, which some vnskilful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they see me to themselues to prooue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because the highest Monarchs haue not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not bee measured by outward successe. For in the disputacion of free will, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impediments, perfoarme and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he haue in eueriething both a free election of judgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Astilus Rigulius, enclosed in the narrowesse of a tonne, set full of sharpe prickeles, shall no lesse haue free will than Augustus Cesar, governing a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

A confutation of the objections that are wont to be brought for defence of Freewill.

It might seeme that we haue faide enough alreadie, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with faile opinion of libertie, labour to throue it downe headlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certaine reasons to affiail our meaning. First they heape vp together diverse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from common reason: afterwaarde they fet upon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate back in order. If (faile they) Sinne be of necesitie, then causeth it to be finne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be avoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to affiail Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I denie therefore that this ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I denie againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be avoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and and see to escape from his judgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise doe: God hath that answer ready which in another place hath spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaves to sinne, can will nothing but evil. For whence commeth this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but upon this, that Adam of his owne accord made himselfe subject to the tyranny of the Dicell? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bondes whereof we are holden fast tied, for that the first man fell from his Creator. If all men be irrestibly held slaine of his falling away, let them not thinke themselves excused by necessitie, in which it felte they have a most evident cause of their damnation. And this I have above plainly set forth, and I have gueuen an example in the Dicell himselfe, whereby it might appeare, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth nevertheless willingly sinneth: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceased not to be a will. Which saem thing Bernard also aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs to subject vs to, that we be the bondslaves of sinne, as we have before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntarie it straightway leapeth to free: but we have before prooved, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subject to free election.

2. They further say, that if both venemuses and vices proceed not of free choice of will, it is not reasonoble that either punishment shoulde be laide vpon man or rewarde gueuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristotle's, yet I grant it in some places vsey by Chrysostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Delogants, Hierome himelife hideth not, and also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God worketh in vs: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are irrestibly laide vpon vs from whom the guiltinesse of sinne proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sin be done by free or bond judgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially fith man is hereby prooved a sinner, for that he is under the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of right oules: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they lieng rather vpon Gods bountifulnesse, than vpon our owne deseruings. How oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deseruings, but his owne gifte: and that they are called rewards, not as due to our deseruings, but such as are rendred to the graces already beflowed vpon vs? Wisely in deed they note it, that now there remaineth no place for deseruings, if they come not out of the fountain of free will: but where they reckon that which we lay so far differing from truth, they are much deceived. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly not each for necessitie, that which they thinke to vnlawfull to confesse, as where he faith: What be the merits of any men whatsoever they be? when he commendeth not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners. Againe, if that shall be rendered to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be punished: what is done then? God hath not gueuen thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estranged from grace, boast of thy deseruings. Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selfe, Sinnes are thine, but deseruings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when reward commeth, he shall crown his owne gifte, and not thy deseruings. And in the same meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deserture, but deserture of grace. And a little after hee concludes, that God with his gifte goeth before all deseruings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deseruings, and doth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing whereupon to base. But what neede is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often founde in his writings? But the Apostle shall yet better deluere them from this errour, if they heare what beginneth.

ning he conveys the glory of the Saints: Whom he hath chosen, them he hath called: whom he hath called, them he hath justified: whom he hath justified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as winnetheth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? because by the Lord's mercy and not by their owne endeoure they are both chosen and called and justified. Away therefore with this vaine file, that there shall no more be any deseruings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolishe to be fared away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth us. If (faith he) thou haft receiued all things, why gloriest thou, as if thou hadst not receiued them? Thou feest that for the same cause he taketh all things from free will, to leave no place for deseruings: but as the bounteoufness and liberality of God is manifolde, and impoffible to be spent out, those graces which he beftowe on us, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne verteues.

Moreover they bring forth which may seeme to be taken out of Aphrode: If this be not the power of our will, to chooe good or euill, then they that are parterks of the fame nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is he, whatfoeuer he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about under the name of Ambrofe, when he maketh this argument, that no man should ever depart from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leave vnus vs the statute of mutabilitie: wherein it is manuell that fo excellent men fell besides themselves. For how chanceth it came not in Chryf Stones minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earneftnesse affirmeth, that all together are peruerse and giuen to wickeuinesse: but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercre it commeth to passe that all abide not in peruerseuinesse. Therefore whereas naturally we are all sick of one disease, they oty recover health uppon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The reft whom by just judgement he paffeth over, and away in their owne rotennesse till they be confirmed. Neither is it of any other caufe that some continue to the ende, and some fall in their course beginne. For continuance is selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom he pleaseth himselle. If a man ask for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnsetuinesse, we knowe none other caufe but that God sustainth the one fort strengthened with his power that they perith not, and doth not giue the fame strength to the other fort, that they may be examples of incostanence.

4. Further they preshe vs, sayinge, that exhortations are vainely taken in hand, that the yse of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it bee not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustyne he was compelled to write the booke of Correption and grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his admonitaries to this summe: O man, in the commandements learn what thou oughtest to doe: in correption learn that by thine owne fault thou haft not, in praier learnes whence thou maest receive that which thou wouldest have. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirit and Letter, where he teacheth that God measureth not the commandements of his lawe by the strenght of man, but when he hath commanded that which is right, he freely giueth to his elect power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long dibutation. First we are not onely in this case, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Now let the other looke how they will get the maisterie in struing, that match them with such admonitaries. Doeth Christ, which tesieth that we can doe nothing without him, any thing the leffe rebuke and chastifie them, that without him did euill? Doeth he leffe exhort every man to apply himselfe to good works? How courteously doth Paul inuere against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet he praieth for charitie to be giuen to the same men from from God, He teacheth in the Epistle to the Romans, that it is neither of him that willeth, not of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy, and yet he causeth not afterward to admonish, to exhort, and to rebuke. Why do they not therefore speak to the Lord, that he do not so loose his labour in requiring of men those things, which he himselfe alone can give, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercy of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lorde had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readie to be founde of them that reverently feele it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the changing of the minde, Paul declareth, when he writeth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but the Lorde that giveth the increase one ly, effectuall worketh. So we see that Moses severally establisheth the commandements of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharply call upon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confess, that men do then only waxe wise, when a hart is givem to understnde, that it is the proper worke of God to circumcise the harts, and in stead of stony harts to give harts of flesh, to write his lawes in the bowels of men; finally in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may bee effectuall.

5 Wherefore then these exhortations? For this purpose, if they bee defiuned of the wicked with an obstinate hart, they shall be for a witness unto them when they shall come to the judgment seate of the Lorde, yea and euene now alreadie they bear and strike their conscience: for howsoever the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disprooue them: but thou wilt say, what may he do? If the obstinacy of hart, which was necessarilie required to obedience, bee denied him? Nay rather, why doth he excuse himselfe, when he can impute the hardness of hart to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are thrown downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chief profite towards the faithfull is to be confidered: in whom as the Lorde worketh all things by his spirit, so he leaueth not the instruments of his worde, and slayeth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stande which is true, that all the strength of the godly reftyeth in the grace of God, according to that sayng of the Prophet: I will givem them a new hart, that they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their dute, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? Why are they moved with exhortation, that they can make no more haste than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? why are they chastised at any time they are gone out of the way, lest they fell by the necessarie weaknesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receiue the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing els profit with the godly, but to reprooue them of sinne, they were euene for that thing onelie to be counted not altogether vnprofitable. Nowe, forasmuch as by the holie Ghost working inwardly, they much auail to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake off sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasse and venemous sournesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred of yrklesomesse thereof: who dare call that they are superfluoues? If any man require a plainer answere, let him take this: God worketh after two forts in his elect, inwardly by his spirit, outwardly by his worde: By his spirit, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their harts to the loue and keeping of justice, he maketh them anewe creature: By his worde, he sturreth them to desire, to seeke and attaine the same renewing, by them both he sheweth forth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution.

distribution. When he sendeth the same words to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to serve for another vse: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witnesses of conscience, & may against the day of judgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounceth that no man cometh to him, but whom the Father draweth, and that the elect do come when they have heard and learned of the Father: yet doth he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whom it necessarily behoveth to be inwardly taught by the holy ghost, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the favour of death to death, but a sweete favour to God.

6. They be very laborious in heaping together of testimonies of Scripture: and that they do pro of purpose, that when they cannot oppresse vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battles, when it commeth to hande strokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and shewe foote there hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it bee, verie easie for vs to overthrowe them with all their route. For, because the places that they abuse against vs, when they are once divided into their orders, do meete upon a fewe speciall points, vs shall with one auouere satisfie mane of them: therefore it shall not be needfull to carrie upon dilligently every one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commandements, which they thinke to be too tempered to our strengthes, that what soever is proued to be required by the one, it necessarily followeth, that it may beperfomned by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the commandemnts, and by them do measure the proportion of our strength. For (sake they) either God mocketh when he chargeth vs with holiness, godliness, obedience, chastitie, love and meeknesse: and when hee forbidde vs vs to be unmeeknesse; idolatrye, vnchastitie, wrath, robberie, pride, and such like: or hee requireth only those things that are in our power. Now we may divide into three forts in manner all the commandements that they heape together. Some require our first conversion to God, some speake simplicly of the keeping of the lawe: some command vs to continuc in the grace of God that we have received. First let vs speake of them all in generalitie, and then descend to the special forts. To extend the power of man to the commandements of the lawe, hath indeed long ago begunne to be commone, and hath some shewe: but it proceedeth from most rude ignorance of the lawe. For they thinke that sinne is a heinous offence, if it be faide that the keeping of the lawe is impossible, do rest forsooth upon this most strong argument, that else the lawe was gien in vaine. For they speake in such forts, as if Paul had no where spoked of the law. For, I beseech them, what meaneth these sayings, that the lawe was set because of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: that the lawe maketh sinne: that the lawe entred, that sinne might abound: was it meant that the lawe was to be limited to our strengths, least it should be gien in vaine? or rather that it was set farre aboue vs to conceuine our weaknesse? Truely by the same mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the lawe is charitie. But when he witheth the minde of the Thessalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confess, that the lawe foundeth in our cares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our harts.

7. Truely, if the Scripture did teach nothing else, but that the lawe is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeuer, I would also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare vnto us the manifold vse of the lawe: it is convenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause: it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what wee ought to doe, the power to obey commeth of the goodnesse of God, and therefore moueth vs to prayer, whereby we may may require to have it giv'n vs. If there were only the commandment and no promise, then were our strengths to be tried whether they were sufficient to answer the commandment, but such there are promises joyned withall, which e't we our, that not only our side, but also all our whole power consisteth in the helpe of God's grace, they doe testify y'ough and more, that we are altogether v'nfit, much more insufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengths with the commandments of God be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of justice, which he purpos'd to give in his lawe, according to the rate of our weaknesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how unready wee are of our selves which in every behalfe doe so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shall be perswaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his lawe to stockes and stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stockes nor stones, when being taught by the lawe that their lustes doe v'nfit their, they are provoked to serve their owne wittnesse. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weaknesse, they fixe unto grace. For which purpose sete these sayings of Augustine: The Lord comandeth those things that we cannot doe, that we may know what we ought to ask of him. Great is the profit of the commandments, if to much be giv'n to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe comandeth; yea, the lawe therefore comandeth, that faith may obtaine that which was comand'd by the lawe: yea, God requireth faith in seflc of vs, and findeth not what to require vnlesse he giveth whatsoever he fin'de Againe, Let God giveth whatsoever he commandeth, and command what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be scene in rehearsing the three sortes of commandments which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the law and in the Prophets, that we be comerted unto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Comert me Lord, and I shall be comerted: for after that thou didst comert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth vs to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of our hart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hand. He each where requireth newnesse of hart, but in another place hee teares the heart that it is giv'n by himselfe. That which God promiseth (faith Augustine) we doe not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth by grace. And this is the fame note, that he himselfe rehearsed in the sixth place among the rules of Ticonium; that we well make difference betweene the lawe and the promises, or betweene the commandments and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commandments whether man be able to doe any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commandments themselves are fulfilled. The commandments of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serve and cleave vnto his will; to keep his commandements, to follow his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testify that it is his gift whatsoever righteousness, holinesse, godliness or puiritie may be had. Of the thirde sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of contancie is to be had, the fame Paul teareth in another place. That remaineth, faith he, brethren, be ye strong thorough the Lord. In another place he forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieve the spirite of God, wherewith wee are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that here requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wisteth it to the Thesalanians, from God, namelie that he would reckon them worthy of his holy calling: and fulfill all the purpose of his goodnesse, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the seconde Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, he oftentimes commendeth their good and godly will; yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the hart of of Titus, to take upon him to give exhortation. If Titus could not so much as vfe the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so farre as God did put vnto him, how should other haue being to doe, vnlesse God himselfe had directed their harts?

9 The craftier sort of them doe cauall at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that we may ioyne our owne strengths, and God to helpe our weake endeavours. They bring also places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conversion seemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne yee to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lord bringeth vs, we haue aboue shewed, and it is not needesfull here to repeate it. This one thing I woulde haue graunted me, that it is mainly gathered, that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, because God doth command the obedience of it: For as much as it is evident, that for the fulfilling of all the commandements of God, the grace of the lawe is more necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby then it appeareth, that at the leaft there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremias cannot be wiped away with any caullations: that the covenant of God made with the ancient people was voide, because it was onely literall, and that it could no otherwise be established, than when the spirite commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Turne yee to me, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their error. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith here weth our harts to repentance, but wherewith he by pro-

the promises whereby God doth couenaunt with our will, of which sort are: Seek e good and not cauall, and ye shall live. If ye will and doe heare, ye shall eate the good things of the earth: but if ye will not, the sword shall devour you, because the Lorde's mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away these abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driven out: if thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and doe all his commandements which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconveniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefits which the Lorde doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them viole. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent com-plaintes, that the Lorde doth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hангeth vpon our will, if the same will be not in our power: And that this liberalitie of God shoulde be a goodly thing forsooth, if hee to let his benefits before vs, that we haue no power to vfe them: and a mauellous assurance of his promises, which hang vpon a thing impossible, so as they might never bee fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adjoyned, wee will speake in another place: so that it shall bee plain, that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much concerneth this place: I denie that God doth vngently mocke vs, when hee meoucheth to deferre his benefits, whom he knoweth to be vterly vnable to doe it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull faithful and to the wicked, they hate their vse with both forts. As God with his commandements priceth the consciences of the wicked, that they should not too sweetly take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his judgements: so in his promises hee doth in a manner take them to witnesse, how vnworthie they are of his goodnesse. For who can deny that it is most rightfull and convenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whom he is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Maiestie, according to his feuerite? Therefore God doth well and orderly when in his promisses hee adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bounde with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then only enjoy his benefits, if they departe from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may understand that they are woorthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Again, bicaufe he seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not be inconvenient, if he attempt the same thing alfo by promisses, which we have shewed that hee hath done to great profit with commandements toward them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commandements, we are put in minde of our miferie, which doe withal our heart too farre distant from the fanie, and wee bee therewithall pricke forward to call vpon his spirite, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggischnesse is not sufficicntly thatpened with commandements, there are added promisses which with a certaine sweetnesse may allure vs to the love of them. And that the more defire that we have of righteousness, we may be the more fervent to seek the fanour of God. Loe how in these requestes (if you will: If you shall heare, the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet moketh vs not for our want of power.

11 The thirde sort of their arguments, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring foroorth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthanked people, and saith that they themselves onely were the cause that they receiued not of his tender loue all kinde of good things. Of which sort are the places: Amalech and the Canaanee are before you, with whose sworde you shall fall, because yee would not obey the Lorde, because I called and yee answered not, I will do to this house as I did to Solo. Again, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lorde their God, nor hath receiued discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde. Again, because yee have hardened your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euils are hapened vnto you. Howe (sayers) could such reproches be layde against them which might readily aunswere? As for vs, wee loued prosperitie, and feared aduerfitie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoide the other we obeyed not the Lord, nor heartened to his voice: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie to do, because we were subject to the dominion of sinne. Vaineil therefore are these euils layde to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoide. But leaving the pricence of necessitie, wherein they haue but a weake and sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge themselves of all fault. For if they be founde guiltie of any fault, then the Lorde doth not without caufe reprocheth them, that it came to passe by their peueriennesse, that they felt not the fruit of his Clemencie. Let them aunswere therefore, whether they can deny, that their froward will was the cause of their stubbornnesse. If they find the spring head of the euil within themselves, why gape they to finde out foyrne causeth, that they might seeme not to haue beene authors of their owne destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both depruned of the benefits of God, and chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinatly forward in their faultes, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vnjust crueltie: that if they have not cast off all willingness to learn, they may be wearie of their sinnes, by the deservings whereof they fee themselves miserable and undone, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord recovereth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemn prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are allowed, did awaie with the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Jews, to whom Hieremias is commanded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not have fallen otherwise than the Lord had forefadeth. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these wordes, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not answer thee. To what ende then did they sing to deafe men? that being even loath and unwilling, yet they should understand that it was true that they heard, that it were wicked and abashed if they should lay upon God the blame of their evils which resteth in themselves. By these few solutions thou mayst easily deliver thy self from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to erect an image of free will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandments as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalme concerning the Jews: A froward generation that have not made their heart straight. Also in another Psalme, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the proper inclination of them. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is onely of God. The Prophet saith: I have inclined my hart to keepe thy commandements, because he had willingly and with a cherefull earnest affection of mind addicted himselfe to God, and yet he doth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Psalme to be the gift of God. Therefore we must holde in mind the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne salvation with fear and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the performing. In deed hee aligneth them offices, to be doing, that they shoulde not give themselves to slumberinnesse of the fleshe; but in that he commandeth them to have feare and carefullnesse, he doth humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commandes to doe, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worketh patiently, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heaven, that they should claime nothing at all to themselves. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we should addde power in faith, he granteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing feuerally by our selves, but onely heezaketh the slothfulnesse of the fleshe, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choaked. To the same purpose saeth the saying of Paul: Extinguished not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doth oftentimes crepe upon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choyce to cherish the light being offred them, his ignorance shall be easilly confuted: because the same same diligence that Paul required, commeth onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commande to purge our selves from all slothfulnesse: whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himself alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conveyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plainly by the wordes of John: Who soever is of God, faueth himselfe. The aduancers of free will take holde of this saying, as if we were fauned partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though we hadnot from heaven the very same same keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to faue vs from enmity, and wee know that the godly, while they warre against Satan, do get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commanded vs to purifie our soules in the obedience, of of truth, he by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength is of no force in the spiritual battell, John briefly theweth, when he faith, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sin, because the seed of God abideth in them. And in another place he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victory that overcometh the world.

12 Yet there is alleged a testimony out of the Law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our salvation. For after the publishing of the Law, he protesteth vnto the people in this manner. The commandement that I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre off: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy hart, thou shouldst doe it. Truly, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandements, I grant they be of no small weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easines and readiness of observacion, but of knowledge: yet even so peraduenture it would also leave some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expostor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospel. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, that they might be drawen to the Gospel, although his boldnesse is to say shall not be without impetue, yet is there sufficient matter beide the authentick of the Apostle to convincke him withall. For if Moses spake of the commandements onely, then hee professed the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they else have done, but throwen themselues downe headlong, if they had taken upon them the keeping of the Law by their owne strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the Law, where there is no accesse vnto it, but by a headlong fall to destrucion? Wherfore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moses in these words did meane the covenant of mercie, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the Law. For in a few verses before hee had taught, that our harts must be circumcised by the hand of God, that we may love him. Therefore he placed that easinesse, whereby he straightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the helpe and succour of the holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightily in our weakenes. Albeit the place is not simply to be understood of the commandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospel, which are so farre from stablishing a power in vs to obtaine righteouenesse, that they utterly overthrowe it. Paul considering that same, prooueth by this testimony, that salvation is offered vs in the Gospel, not under that hard and impossible condition, wherewith the Law dealeth with vs, that is, that they only shall attaine it which have fulfilled all the commandements, but vnder a condition that is easie, readie, and plaine to come vnto. Therefore this testimony maketh nothing to chalenge freedom to the will of man.

13 There are also certaine other places wont to be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing the succour of his grace, trieth men, and wanteth to see to what end they will apply their endeouers, as is that place in Osee: I will goe to my place till they put it in their hart and seke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seke his face, vnlesse their minds were pliable that they might after their owne will incline themselues to the one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly vfed with God in the Prophets, to make a shew as if hee did despise and cast away his people, till they have amended their life. But what will the aduersaries gather out of such threatnings? If they meant to gather, that the people being forsaken of God, may purpose their owne salvation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessarie to conversion, why strue they with vs? But they so graunt it necessarie, that still they will have mans power preferred vnto him. How prooue they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it.

When Moses doth seeme to intimate a kind of facilitie in man to fulfill the Law of God: he meaneth by the Law the promises of the Gospel, which are easily received not in respect of our habitation but of Gods mercie which worketh mightily in framing our harts.

That God is said to withdrw his seke, and to trie whether men will seke after him, is no argument that of themselves they can seke unto him: but that he by hiding his face doth bring them to see that without his grace they are nothing.
Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to look what he will doe being given over and left to himselfe; and another thing to helpe his little strength after the measure of his weaknes. What then (will some man say) doe these manners of speaking meane? I answer that they are as much in effect, as if God had said: For as much as I prevaile nothing with this stubborn people by admonishing, exhusting and rebuking, I will withdraw my selfe awhile; and so full and suffer them to be affected: I will see if at length, after long miseries, they will begin to remember me, to seek my face. The Lords going farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecies: his looking what men will doe, signifieth that he keepeth silence, and as it were hiding himselfe, doth for a time exercise them with divers affections. Both these things he doth to humble vs vs the more. For we should sooner be dulled than amended with the scourges of aduersitie, 'vndele he did frame vs to that tractablenesse by his spiritu. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obstinate stubbornnesse, doth for a time leave vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine presence of himselfe) and doth make a prooffe what we would doe in his absence, it is falsely gathered hereof, that there is any strength of free will that he should behold and trie, forasmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to drive vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

14. They bring also for their defence the continuall manner of speaking, that is vsed both in the Scriptures and in the talk of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no lesse said that we doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, than that we commit sinnes. But if sinnes be suitly imputed to vs, as proceeding from us, truly in righteous doings also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned vs. For it were against reason that it should be said that we doe those things, to the doing whereof being vaile of our owne motion, we are moued by God like stones. Therefore though we giue the chief part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shew that our endeouer hath also yet a second part. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good works are called ours, I would object againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to have given vs of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifulitie and free gift of God, the same thing becometh ours, which otherwise is not due unto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the same absurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good works are called ours, in which we have no properitie, but by the liberaltie of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our selves doe worship God, obey the Law and apply good works. Sith these are the duties properly belonging to the minde and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to us, vnlesse there were a certaine communicating of our Endeavour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily wynnde our felues, if we well consider the manner how the spirit of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherewith they enuiously prefixe vs is from the purpose, for who is so fond to thinke that the movin of man differeth nothing from the calling of a stone? Neither doth any such thing follow of our doctrine. We reckon among the natural powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will and not to will, to endeouer and to rest, that is, to allow vanitie and to refuse perfect goodnesse, to will euill and to be vnwillinge to good, to endeouer our selves to wickednesse, and to rest in righteousnesse. What doth the Lord herein? Is it be his will to vse that peruersenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directed and appointeth it to what ende he will, that he by an euill hand may execute his good worke. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so serneth the power of God, when he laboureth only to obey his owne lust, to a stone that being thrown by the violence of another, is caried neither with moving nor tenes nor will of his owne? We see how much difference there is. But what doth doth he in good things, of which is our principal question? when he erecteth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restrains mans will, that it be not carried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holiness and righteousnesse, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousnesse: and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth establish and confirmeth with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine faith: Thou wilt say unto me: then are we wrought and work not. Yea, thou both workest and art wrought, and thou worketh well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirit of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worketh, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moving of the holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnes. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that we also doe work somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing severally to vs: but because he would not cherish slothfulness in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he said a little before, Vnleffe God helpe vs, we shall not be able to overcome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the worde is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirit to direct and Gouerne the will of man. And it cannot Gouerne it, vnleffe it correct it, reforme it, and renew it (from whence we say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours may be destroyed) and vnleffe it moue it, firre it, drudge it forward, Carrie it, and holde it. Whereupon we doe truly say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholly the owne worke of the same grace. In the mean time we deny not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these thinges doe it stand very well together: that mans will be said to be restored, when the faultinesse and peruerfites therof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of justitie: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, for ain such as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth utterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrarie, but that we may well be said to doe the same thing that the spirit of God doth in vs, although our owne will doe of itselfe giue vs towards it nothing at all that may be feuered from his grace. And therefore wee must keep that in minde, which we have elsewhere allaged out of Augustine, that some doe in vain trauail to finde in the will of man some good thing that is properly his owne. For whatsoever mixture men study to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoever good is in the will of man he proceedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to will, it is not without cause said, that we doe those thinges whereof God challengeth the praiue to himselfe. First, because it is our whatsoever by his goodnes he worketh in vs, so that we understand it to be not of our owne: and then because the minde is ours, the will is ours, the endeuer is ours, which are by him directed to good.

16 Those other testimonies beside these, that they scrape together here & there, shall not much trouble euin meane wits that have well conceiued only the solutions above said. They alledge that laying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be under thee, and thou shalt bear rule over it. Where they expound of sin, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of sin should not get the upper hand in his minde, if he would labor in subduing of it. But we say that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reprove the wickednes of the enue that Cain had conceiued against his brother. And that he
doeth two waies. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excel his brother in gods fight, whereof no honour is gien but vnto rightouesnesse: the other, that he was too much vnthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him subiect under his authority. But left we should seem therfore to imbrace this exposition, because the other is against vs: let vs admit that God spake of sin. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he command, then have we already thewed, that ther-by followeth no prooe of the power of man. If he promiseth, where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subiect to sin, over which he should have had dominion.
They will say, that in the promis was included a secret condition, as if it had bee faid, that he should have the victory if he would strive for it. But who will receive these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sin, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be aboue our power. Albeit both the matter it selfe & the order of Grammar do require, that there be a comparision made of Cain and Abel, because the elder brother should not have bin set behind the yoonger, ynles he had become worse by his owne wicked doing.

17 They vfe also the testimonie of the Apostle, which faith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mans will and endeuer, which of it selfe though it be weak, being holpe by the mercy of God, is not without prosperous success. But if they did soberly vey, what matter Paul there intreateth of, they would not so vnadoubtedly abuse this sentence. I knowe that they may bring fortooth Origen and Hierome for maintainers of their exposition: and I could on the other side let Augustine against them. But what they have thought it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he tacheth that salvation is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchesfeth to grant his mercie: and that ruine and destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had vnder the example of Pharaoh declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the aurrenders of free election by the testimonie of Moses, I will have mercie vpon whom I will have mercie. Now he concludes, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus vnderstood, that will or endeuer are not sufficient, because they are too weake to so great a weight, that which Paul faith, had not been aptly spoken: Therefore away with these subtleties, to say: It is not of him that willith, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is somwhat, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simly, thus: It is not wil, it is not running that get vs the way to salvation, herein is only the mercy of God. For he speakeoth no other wise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that the goodnesse and kindnesse of God appeareth not by the workes of righteousnesse which we have done, but for his infinite mercie. They themselves that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he saith, that it is not of him that willith, nor of him that runneth, would not give me leave to reason after the same fashion, that we have done some good workes, because Paul faith, that we haue not attained the goodnesse of God by the good workes that we haue done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eies, and they shall perceiue that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine refleth vpon, if it were therefore said that it is not of him that willith nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrarie part that it is not of the mercie of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an abfurditie, Augustine doth rightfylly conclude, that this is spoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, nor but that we ought both to will and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs.
No lefse vnaply doe some wrest that sayinge of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be reftrained onely to the minifters: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselves, but because God vfeth their feruice, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie gifts.

18 They bring forth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not vnown, is a writer of whose authoritie is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he thinke for free will? He faith, that man so loone as he was created, was left in the hand of his owne counsel: that commandemements were giuen him, which if he observed, he should againe be preferred by them: that before man was set life and death, good and euill: that whatsoeuer he would, shoule bee giuen him. Bee it, that man received from his creation power to obteine either life or death. What if, on the other side we answere, that he lofte it? Truly my minde is not to speake against Solomon, which afirmeth that man at the beginning was create vp-right, and he forgoed vnto himselfe many intentions. But because man in finruring, lost as it were by shipwracke both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answere, not to them onely, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meanest to instruct man, to secke within himselfe power to attaine saluation, thy authoritie is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any prejudice, be it neuer so small, against the vndoubted word of God. But if thou onely studie to restraine the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of his owne euils vpon God, vseth to secke a vaine defence for itselfe, and therefore thou answerest, that vprightness was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree vnto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornaments, where-with God had clothed him at the beginning: and that so we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

19 Yet they have nothing ofterner in their mouth than the parable of Chrift of the waifaring man, whom theeuces laid abroad halfe dead in the way. I know that it is common almost with all writers, that the calamitie of mankind is represented vnder the figure of that wayfarer man. Thereupon doe our aduersaries gather an argument, that man is not so mayned with the robbery of sinne and the deuil, but that he keepeth still remaining the leaueings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that he was left halfe alue. For where is that halfe life, vnderlasse some portion both of right reaon and will remayned? First if I would not give place to their allegorie, I beleech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was denifed by the fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords words. Allegories ought to goe no further than they have the rule of Scripture going before them: so far is it off, that they be by themselves sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reaons, whereby I can, if I lift, overthrow this deuise, for the word of God leauch not to man halfe a life, but teaccheth that hee is utterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth bleffed life. And Paul when he speakeh of our redemption, doth not lay that we were healed, when we were halfe dead and halfe alue, but that we were rased vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe alue to receive the light of Chrift, but them that sleepe and are buried. And in like manner speaketh the Lorde himselfe, when he faith, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voice. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plain sentences? But let this allegorie have the force of a certaine testimonie, yet what shall they wringe out of vs thereby? Man is halfe a liue, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I grant: he hath a wit capable of understanding, although it pears not to the heavenly and spirituall wisedome: he harh Cap. 6. Of the knowledge of true judgement of honestie: he hath some feeling of the Godhead, howbeit that he attaineth not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truly they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine be taken fi6 vs, which is also approv'd by common consent of the Schooles: that after manes fall the freely giuen good things, whereupon saluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his natural gifts are corrupted, and defiled. Let therefore this truth remaine with vs undoubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteounesse of God, that it conceueth, coveteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, uncleannesse, and mischief: that his heart is so throughly soked in poysyn of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt sinke: But if at any time they do utter any goodnesse in shew, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocrie and deceitfull crookednes, and the hart entangled with inward peruersines.

That man being lost, must seeke for redemption in Christ.

Sith all mankinde hath perished in the person of Adam, that excellencie and nobilitie of beginning which we have spokeng of, would so little proffite vs, that it would rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeareth the redeemer in the person of his onely begotten sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sinne to be his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creator whereof we have entreated, were vnprouitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting fourth God a father, vnto vs in Christ. Truely this was the natural order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godliness, from whence might be made a pathwaie for vs to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but since our falling away, why then focuer we turne our eies, vpward and downward, the curse of God still preuenteth it selfe vnto our sight, which while it posseth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needs overwelmme our owne soules with desperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly favoyr toward vs do still many waies appeare: yet by beholding of the world we cannot gather that he is our Father when our conscience inwardly pracketh vs, and sheweth that there is in sinne cause of forsaking, why God should not account or recken us for his children. Beside that there is in vs both flothfulnesse and vnhankfulnesse: because both our mindes, as they bee blinded, doe not see the truth, and also as all our senses be peruerse, we malicioufly defraud God of his glory. Therefore we must come to that saying of Paul: because in the wisdome of God, the world knew not God by wisdome, it pleaeth God by the foolishnesse of preaching to fauie them that beleue. The wisdome of God he calleth this honourable fadge of heauen and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof we ought wisely to have known God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the faith of Christ, which for that it seemeth foolish, the vnbelieuers do disdaigne. Wherefore although the preaching of the creffe do not agree with mans wit, yet ought we humbly to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator and maker, that he may begin againe to be our father. Truely since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God attiued to saluation, without the Mediatour: For Christ spakeeth not of his own age onely, but comprehendeth all ages, when he saith that this is the eternall life, to knowe the Father the one true God; and him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their fluggerishnesse, which take upon them to set open heauen to all prophane and vnbelieuving men, without his grace, whom the Scripture each where where teacheth to be the only gate whereby we enter into salvation. But if any will restrain that saying of Christ onely to the publishing of the Gospell, we have in readings wherewith to confute him. For this hath beene a common sentence in all ages & among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are estranged from God, and pronounced accursed, and the children of wrath, cannot please God. And here may bee also alleged that which Christ answered to the woman of Samaria: Yee worship what ye know not, but we worship that which we know: because the salvation is from the Iewes. In which wordes he both condemneth of falshood all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redeemer was promised vnder the lawe to the onely chosen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worship euer pleased God, but that which had respect vnto Christ. For which cause also Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and void of the hope of life. Nowe where as John teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that all the world fell from it, we must returne to the same fountaine Christ. And therefore Christ, in so much as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himselfe to be the life. And truly the entrance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the bodie of the onely begotten sonne. And John plainly teiftith, that they which believe in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of faith in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to have touched it by the way.

2 And therefore God neuer shewed himselfe mercifull to the olde people, nor euer did put them in any hope of grace without the mediator. I omit to speake of the sacrifices of the law, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that salvation is nowhere else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was perfourmmed by Christ alone. Onely this I fate, that the blessed and happy state of the Church hath beene alwaye grounded upon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his covenante, yet doth Paul wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seede in whom all nations were to be blessed, for as much as we know that not all they were reckenned his seed that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Iesu and other) how came it to passe, that of the two sones of Isaac, that is Iaue and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen the other refused? Yea, how came it to passe that the elder was rejected and the younger onely took place? And howe also came it to passe that the greater part should be forfaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckenned in one person, and that the promised salvation did neuer stande sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang vpon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it be not in poine wordes expresst by Mose, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knoewn to all the godly. For before that there was any King create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicite of the godly, even then said she in her song: God shall give strength to his king, and shall exalt the home of his annointed. In which words he meaneth that God shall bleffe his Church. Wherewith also agreeth the oracle that is within a little after adioned: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walk before mine annointed. Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly father was to have the lively image of Christ to be seen in David and his posteritie. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he bidde them to kiffe the Sonne. Wherewith this saying of the Gospell also agreeth: He that honoureth not the Sonne, honoureth not the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes

the kingdom decayed; yet it behoved the covenant to stand which God had made in David and his successors: as also he said by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut off the kingdom, for David my servants sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, whom I have chosen: but there shall remain one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressly addeth: I will affliet the seed of David, but not for euer. Within a little space of time after, it is said: For David his servants sake God hath given a light in Jerusalem, to raise vp a sonne, and to keepe Jerusalem in safety. Now when the state grew towards destruction, it was faire againe: God would not scatter Iuda for David his servants sake, because he had spoken that all other being passed over, onely David was chosen, vpon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in another place it is said: He hath refuseth the tabernacle of Sio, and the tabernacle of Joseph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. He hath chosen his servant David to feede Iacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to save his church, that the safety and preservation thereof should hang vpon that one head, and therefore David crieth out, the Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a praiser: Save thy people and bleffe thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with vnseparable knot joyned to the governement of Christ. And in the same meaning in another place: Lord saue vs: Let the king heare vs in the day that we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithful did vpon none other confidence fixe to the help of God, but because they were hidden under the succour of the king. Which is gathered by another Psalm. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plain enough, that the faithfull are called backe unto Christ, that they may hope that they shall be saved by the hand of God. The same respect hath the other praiser, where all the church calleth vpon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hand, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou haft preferred (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the Psalm be waileth the scattering abroad of the whole people; yet he praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, and all things to mens seeming destroyed, Jeremiah lamenteth the overthrowe of the Church, he doth principallie complaine that by destruction of the kingdom all hope was cut off from the faithfull. Christ (faith he) the spirit of our mouth is taken in our finnes, to whom wee faile: In thy shadow we shall live among the nations. Hereby nowe it sufficiently appeareth that because God cannot be mercifull to mankinde without the Mediator, therefore Christ was alwaies before the holy fathers in time of the lawe, to whom they might direct their faith.

Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliverance of the Church is describ'd, there the banner of affiance and hope is announced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, saith H accel. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restorings of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to David, concerning the everlasting continuance of the kingdom. And no maruell: For otherwise there had been no allurance of the covenant. For which purpofe severall that notable answer of Ezech. For when he saith that the unbelieuing king Ahab refuseth that which he had declared to him of the sauing of the siege of Jerusalem and of present saftetie, as it were forsoorely, he passed ouer to Meffias. Behold a virgin shall conceiue and bring forth a sonne, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their retourndes refuseth the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselves to discredite the truth of God, yet the covenant should not be void, but that the redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the end they might shew that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdom of David, whereupon hanged the redemption and everlasting salvation. So saith faith: I will make a covenant with you the faithful mercies of David. Behold I have given him for a wittnesse to nations, that is, because the faithful whan their state is at the worst, could not otherwise have any hope, but by the means of him being wittnesse, that God would be appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremias, to raise them vp being in depayre, faith: Behold the days come, where in I will raise vp unto David a righteous branch, and then shall Juda be saued, and Israel shall dwell in safety. And Ezekiel faith, I will raise vp one sheepeheard over my sheepe, even David my servant. The Lord will bee a God to them, and my servant David for a sheepeheard. And I will make a covenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after he had entreated of the incredible renewing, he faith: my servant David shall be their king, and there shall be one sheepeheard over all, and I will make an everlasting covenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a few places out of many, because I onely mean to have the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeably hereto, as it is faide in Osee. The children of Juda Osee.12. and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall appoint to themselves one head. Which he afterwaide more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel Osee.3.5. shall returne, and shall secke for the Lorde their God, and David their king. And Miche speaking of the returne of the people expresly faith, The king shall goe before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renewing of the people faith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of David that is fallen downe, and I will hedge vp the gaps, and raise vp the places overthrown, etc. because that was the onely standard of salvation, to have the royall glorie to rise vp againe on high in the stock of David, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharias, as his age was neerer to the appeareing of Christ, so doth he more plainly write it: be glad thou daughter of Sion, rejoice thou daughter of Hierusalem. Behold thy king commeth, righteous and saued. Which agreeth with the place of the Psalme before allenged: The Lorde the strength of the saluations of his appointed, Lorde saue us. Psal.8.8. Where saluation is derived from the head to the whole bodie.

4 It was Gods will to have the Iewes instructed with these prophecies, that to secke for their delierance, they should bend their eies directly to Christ. And though they had shamefully swared, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be abolished, that God by the hande of Christ, as he had promised to David, would be the deliever of the Church, and so the covenant should be of his owne free grant, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this long founded in the mouth of the children when Christ a little before his death entred into Hierusalem, Hosanna to the sonne of David. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowne and spok of, and according to common sense that they sung that the onely pledge of gods mercie remained unto them, in the comming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainly and perfectly beleue in God, biddeth them to beleue on himselfe, Belieue yee in God (faith he) then beleue also in me. For though (to speake properly) faith climeth vp from Christ to the father, yet he meaneth that the same faith, albe it rest upon God, doth by little and little vanishe away unless he become a meane to holde it in allured steadfastnesse. Otherwise the majestie of God is too high for mortall men, which crepe upon the grounde like worms, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that common saying, that God is the obiect of faith, but in fitch sort that it needeth correcion. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if we finde not God in Christ, saluation cannot be.
be known vnto vs. For although among the Iewes, the Scribes and Parishes had darkened with false inventions, that which the Prophets had spoked concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ took it for a thing confessed as receivd by common con-

The law was gi-

By this continuall processe that we have rehearsed, may be gathered, that the law was added about fouer hundred yeeres after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to leade away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, that they shoulde not waxe faint with longe tariance. I meane by this worde Lawe, not onely the ten commandements, which prescrib a rule how to live godly and righteously, but also the forme of religion delivred by the hande of Mofes. For Mofes was not made a lawgiver to abolish the blessing promised to the kindred of Abraham: but rather we see how euer where he putteth the Iewes in remembrance of the free covenant made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if he had beene sent to renew the same. That was most plainly sett foorth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer vp loathsome stinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themselves to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloud to wath away their filthinesse? Finally, all the service of God appointed in the lawe (if it be considered by it selfe, and doe not containe containeth shadowes and figures, which the truth should answer into) shall be but a verie mockere. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commandeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the pattern that had beene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not beene some spiritual thing appointed, that she should tende vnto, the Iewes should no lesse have fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men that never earnestly applied the studie of godlineesse, can not without lothsome tediousnes abide to heart so many sundry fashions of things: and they not onely maruell why God wearied his people with such a heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorn them as childrens plates. And the cause is, for that they consider not the ende, from which if the figures of the lawe be seuered, they must needs be condemned of vanitie. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore command sacrifices, because he woulde occypie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their minde higher. Which may also plainly appere by his nature: for as he is spiritual, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spiritual. This do the sayings of the Prophets teftifie, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of sluggishnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of anie value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expiitours of the lawe, so they woulde by this meanie haue mens eyes directed to the marke from which the common people straied. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes it is certainly gathered, that the lawe was not void of Christ. For Moses did set forth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they should become a prietly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtain vnlesse there were had for the meane thereof a great & more excellent reconciliation than by the bloud of beasts. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondflaues of sinne, to be advanced to roiall dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glory of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefit should come vnto them from elsewhere than from themselves? Also howe could the right of priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of sinnes were abominable to God, vnlesse they had beene consecrate in a holie head? Wherefore Peter doth verie aptly turne that saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fulnesse of grace, the tale whereof the Iewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Christ: Yee are (faith he) a chosen kindred, a kingly priesthood. For to this end tended that turning of the words, to shew that they, whom Christ appeareth by the Gospell, have obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both with priestly and kingly honour, that trusting vpon their mediator, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

2 And here by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdom which at length was erected in the house of David, is part of the lawe, and contained vnder the Ministerie of Moses. Wherupon followeth, that as well in all the kindred of the Leuites, as in the potterie of David Christ was set before the eyes of the olde people as in a double looking glass. For, as I said cuen nowe, they could not otherwise bee before God either kings or priests, which were both the bondflaues of sinne and death, and deified by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, that the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a scholemaster, till the seede came for whole fake the promis was giuen. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly known, they were like vnto children, whose weekeneesse could not yet beare a full knowledge of heavenly things, but how they were by ceremonies, as it were lead by the hand to Christ, is spoken before, and may be better understood by many testimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to com daily with new sacrifices to appease God: yet Esay promiseth that all their sinnes shall be be cленсed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniell agreeably faith: The Priest appointed of the tribe of Levi, did enter into the Sanctuary: but of the onely priest it was once faide, that by an oath he was chosen of God to be a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oyle was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shall be another manner of announcing. And because I will not tarry vpon manie examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews euens from the fourth Chapter to the eleuenth doth largely and plainly enough shew, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth and vaine till wee come to Christ. As concerning the ten commandements: that lefion of Paul is like- wise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the end of the law vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueth. And an other lefion, that Christ is the Spirit that quickketh the letter which of it felle flatee. For in the fift of thefe two, he meaneth that righteousness is vaine taught by commandements, vntill Christ do grace it both by free imputation and by the Spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it should nothing profite vs to know what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did fuccour vs faining and oppressed vnder the yoke and vntolerable burden. In another place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is, to bring men to humilitie being prooued guilty of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to fecture Christ, whatsoever he teacheth in diuerse words do all verie well agree together. But because hee then was in contention with perversee teachers, which fainted that we do desire righteousnes by the workes of the law, to confute their errour, he was compelled some time to speake prisciely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is clothed with the couenant of free adoption.

3 But now it is good to know, how being taught by the morall lawe, we are made more inexcufable, that our owne guiltineffe may mooue vs to crave pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousnes in the lawe: then this is also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousness before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heavenly throne of judgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the lawe, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had set before Israel life and death, good and cull. And we may not deny, but that the rewarde of eternall saluation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promised it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether we performe that obedience, vpon desart whereof we may conceiue a truft of that rewarde. For to what small purpose is it, to fee the reward of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse wee further knowe whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But heerein the weakenes of the lawe doth shew it felle. For because that keeping of the lawe is found in none of vs al, we are excluded from the promifes of life, and do fall into cufte onely. I do not now tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre above the power of man, he may indeed a farre off, looke at the promifes, but yet not gather anie fruite of them. Therefore thus one thing remaineth, that by the goodnes of them he may the better way his owne miferie, while he considereth, that all hope of saluation being cut off, death doth certainly hang over him. On the other side do preffe vs terrible penall lawes, which doe holde entangled and fast bound, not onely a fewe of vs, but everie one without exception: they preffe vs, I say, and do pursue vs, with an vnrepeaable rigour, so that we may fee most present death in the law.

4 Therefore if we looke onely vpon the lawe, we can doe nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and despare, forasmuch as by it we are all damned and cursed, and kept farre off from the blefledneffe that he offereth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how smally doth it differ from mocking, mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicite, to allure and exhort men vnto it, to protest that it is laide open for vs, when in the mean season the entrie vnto it is fo closed and impossible to be come to? I answere: although the promises of the lawe, in so much as they are conditionall, doe hang vpon the perfect obedience of the lawe, which can no where be found, yet are they not gien in vaine. For when we have learned that they shal be voide and of no effect vnto vs, vnselde God embraceth vs with his free goodnesse without regarde of our works, and vnselde we doe embrace by faith the same goodnesse gien v by the gospel, then want they not their effectuallnesse, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth so freely giue all things vnto vs, that he addeth this also to the heape of his bountifulnesse, that not refusing our halfe full obedience, and remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he so maketh vs to enjoy the fruite of the promises of the lawe, as if we our selues had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this present procede no further in this matter, because it shall be more largely to be entended of, when we shall speake of the justification of faith.

5 Whereas we saide that it is impossible to kepe the lawe, that is in few wordes to be both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accounted an opinion of great absurditie, so farte that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accurst: what Hierome thought, I do nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is truth. I will not here make longe circumstances of divers forces of possibilities. I call that impossible, which both never hath beeene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it never hereafter may be. If we record from the farthest time of memory, I saie that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his hart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power: Again, that there hath beeene none that hath not beene troubled with concupiscence. Who can say now? I see in deede what manner holy men foolishly superstitious doth imagine vnto vs, euensuch whose purenesse the heauenly Angels doe scarcely countenanc: but against both the Scripture and prooue of experience. I saie also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the mark of true perfection, vnselde he be looed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon saide, there is not a righteous man upon the earth that finneth not. And David saide: euer living man shall not be justified in thy sight. Job in many places affirmeth the same. But Paul most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the flesh. And by no other reason he prooueth that all that are vnder the lawe are subject to the curse, but because it is written, that curdled are all theye that doe not abide in all the commandements thereof: meaning or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoever is foerspoken by the Scriptures, that must be halden for perpetuall, yea and necessarie. With such fundement did the Pelagians trouble Augustine: saying, that there is wrong done to God, to say that he doth command us more than the faithfull are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to avoide their caullation confessed, that the Lorde might in deede, if he would, aduance a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will doe, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that doe I also not deme. But I adde further, that it is inconvenient to dispute of his power against his truth, and therefore this sentence is not subject to caullations if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, whereof the scriptures doe pronounce that it shall not be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saved, he answered: with men in deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stifflie defended, that in this flesh we never yeeld to God the due loue that we owe him.

Loue (faith he) so followed knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath first fully known his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this world, see by a glasse and in a darke speach: it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vs of the lawe which they call Morall. Now, as far as I understand, it is contained in these three parts. The first is, that while it sheweth to every man the rightoufnesse of God, that is, the rightoufnesse which onely is acceptable to God, it admonish, certify, prooue guilte, yea and condemn every man of his owne vrightoufnesse. For so is it needfull that man blinded and drunke with loue of himselfe, be druen both to the knowledge and the confession of his owne weakness, and vncleanesse: for as much as if his vanitie be not euydently convinced, he swelleth with mad auffiance of his owne strength, and can never bee brought to thinke of the flenderness thereof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so soone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoever he before conceiued a great opinion of it, yet by and by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, and then to shake and solter, at last even to fall downe and faint. So being taught by the schooling of the lawe, he putteth off that arrogancie wherewith before he was blinded. Likewife he is to be healed of another disease of pride, whereof we haue said that he is sick. So long as he is suffred to stand to his owne judgement, he deuiseth hypocrisie in steede of rightoufnesse, wherewith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wot not what forged rightoufnesse, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compellde to trie his life by the balance of the lawe, then leaving the preumption of the counterfeit rightoufnesse, he feeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Againe, that he floweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he feemed cleane. For the euals of luft are hidden in so deep and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceiue the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle faith, that he knew not luft, except the law had said: Thou shalt not luft: because except it be by the law disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroieoth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly dart thereof.

7 So the law is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we behold, first our weakness, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, even as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spots of our face. For when power faileth man to followe rightoufnesse, then must he needes sticke fast in the mire of finnes. And after sinne by and by followeth curfe. And of how much the greater transgrefion the lawe holdeth vs guiltie and conuict, with so much the more greevous judgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of finne. For there he speaketh onely of the first office of the lawe, the prooue whereof is in finners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the law entred that sinne might abound, and therefore that it is the ministration of death that worketh wrath and slaie. For without doubt so much more growth iniquitie with how much more understanding of sin the conscience is striken, because vnto breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the finner, because of it selfe it can doe nothing but accuse, condemne and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, onely to this end, to accuse vs and kill vs. And yet when this is saide, neither is the lawe dishonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to salvation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemie with the spiritual lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for salvation, (if it had found fit hearing) ureth to the occasion of sinne and death. For sith we are all prooued transgressors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it declareth our iniquitie: the more surely that it confirmeth the reward of life and salvation laide vp for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore that these sayings should be to the diuinion of the law, that they much auilie to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. Fortruely it thereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruersenesse, that we enjoy not the bleffe of life set openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the sucour of the lawe, is made so much the sweeter, and the merrie more louely that giueth it vnto vs, whereby we leerne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new gifts vpon vs.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimonie of the law, it is not done for this purpose (if at least we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with despaire, or with discouraged minde to tumble downe headlong. In dede the reproue are amended after that manner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoouveth to be another ende of instruction. I graunt the Apostile testifieth that we are all condemned by judgement of the law, that euermouth may be stopped, and that all the world may become bound vnto God: but yet the same Apostile in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded al under unbeliue, not to destroy all, or to suffer all to perish, but that he might haue merrie of all, that leaving the foolish opinion of their owne strength, they might vnderstand, that they stand and are upheld by the onely hande of God: that they being naked and empiace, may fle to his merrie, that they may rest themselves wholly vpon it, hide themselves wholly in it, take hold of it alone in stead of righteousnesse and merits, which is laide open in Christ for all men, whosoever they be that with true faith doe desire and looke for it. For God in his commandements of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteousnesse, whereof we all are destitute, and on the other side a rigorous judge of cuill doings. But in Christ, his face shineth full of grace and lenite, even toward the wretched and vnworthie sinners.

9 Of profiting to craue the grace of his helpe, Augustine speake sth, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The law commandeth that endeouering to doe the things commanded, and being wearied with our weaknesse vnder the lawe, we should leaerne to ask the helpe of grace. Againe to Aselius: The profit of the law is to convince man of his owne weaknesse, and compell him to craue the Philisie of grace that is in Christ. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The law commandeth, and grace miniftreth strength to do. Againe to Valentine: God commandeth those things which we cannot do, that we may leaerne to know what to ask of him. Againe: The lawe was giuen to accute you, that being accused you should scare, that fearing you should craue pardon, and not presume of your owne strengthes. Againe: The lawe was giuen for this purpose, of great to make little, to shew that thou haue no strength of thine owne to righteousnesse, that thou as poore, vnworthie and needie, shouldest flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his speeche to God and faith: Doe to Lord, do so mercifull Lord, commande that which cannot be fulfilled: yea, command that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfill it by their owne strengthes, every mouth may be stopped, and no man may thinke himselfe great. Let all be little ones, and let all the would be guilte before thee. But I am not wise to heape vp so many testimonies, as that holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirit and Letter. The second profiting, he doth not so fully describe, either because he knew that it did hang upon the former, or because he did not so well understand it, or because he wanted words wherewith distinctly and plainly to express his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceived: but this last office of the law is not idle even in the reprobrate also. For though they go not thus farward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh they be renned & florish againe in the outward man, but amazed with the last office doe he flit in desperation: yet is it such to new forth the equit of God's judgement, that their conscience be thus tossed with such waves. For they ever willingly desire to make shift against the judgement of God. Now while the name is not yet opened, they yet so astonish with the testimonie of the law and their conscience do bewray in their feeles what they have deferved.

The second office of the law is, that they which are touched with no care of that which is right and right, vilesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penall ordinances therein, may be refrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward mind is moved or affected withal, but because being as it were bound, they withhold their hand from outward working, and do keepe in their perversenesse within them, which otherwise they would have outrageously poured out. Thereby they become truly neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being left either by feare or by thame, they dare not put that in practice which they have conceived in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet have they not a heart framed to the feare and obedience of God, yea, the more that they hold backe themselves, so much the stronger within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, readie to doe any thing, and to breake forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spirituall hate the law, and do detest God the law-maker, so that if they could, they would verie faine take him away, whom they can not abide, neither when he commandeth rightfull things, nor when he reuengeth him upon the despites of his manshe. In some in deede more darkly, and in some more plainly, but in all generall that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the lawe not by willing submission, but resifting and against their wills, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousness is necessarie for the publicke common state of men, the quiet whereof is herein proued for, while order is taken that all things be not confused with vprore, which would come to passe if all things were lawfull for all men. Yea, it is not vprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Schoole, so long as they befor their calling being yet dejected of the spirit of sanctification, are full wanting with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outward incencipation, by the terror of God's vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in minde, they goe for the present time but a little so, ward, yet they partly grow in vs to beare the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and raw to discipline, as to a thing unknowen. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to have touched, when he faith that the law was not set for the righteous man, but for the vnrighteous and disobedient, wicked and sinners, culle dooers and prophanemans, flayers of their parents, and murderers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, liers and pursuers of men, and whatsoever else is against found doctrine. For he faith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

But to both may that be applied which he faith in another place, that the lawe was to the Jewes a Schoolemaster to Christ, for there are two forts of men, whom with her Schoole the headeth by the hand to Christ. The one fort, of whom we first spake, because they are too full of assurance of their own strength or righteousness, are not meete to receive the grace of Christ, unless they be first emptied: therefore the Law bringeth them downe to humility by knowledge of themselves, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort needs a bridle to be holden backe, lest they so glue the reins to the wantonnes of their flesh, that they fall off altogether from all study of righteousness. For where the spirit of God doth not yet gouve, there sometime lutes do so boyle, that it is in great perill left they throwe downe the foule that is subject to them into the forgetfulness and despising of God: and so would it come to passe, if God did not with this remedie prooude for it. Therefore those whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdom, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the workes of the Law under feare, vntill the time of his visitation, not that chaff and pure faire such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable faire for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlineffe. Of this we have so many proouces, that it needeth no example. For whosoever hath any time continued in not knowing of God, will confess that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the Law in some faire and obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirit, they began hartily to loue him.

12. The third vs, which is also the principall vs, and more necerly looketh vnto the proper end of the Law, concerneth the faithfull, in whose hearts alredie liue and reigneth the spirit of God. For although they have the Law written and graven in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, so attentiously and mured by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet doe they still two worse profit in the Law. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may daily better and more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord, which they are to vnde, and may be confirmed in the understanding thereof. As if a tenant be already bent with all the affection of his hart, to please his Lord, yet such he needeth diligently to search out and make the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame arid apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt himselfe from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by dayly instruction of the Law get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of God's will. Then because wee neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profit shall the tenant of God take by the Law, to be by the often meditacion thereof stirred up to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slipperie way of offending. For after this manner, must these holy ones drudge forward themselves, which with how great cheerfulnesse so ever they trauntere to Godward according to the spirit, yet they are alwayes laden with the sloughishnesse of the flesh, that they procede not with such full readinesse as they ought. To this fleshe is the Law given as a whippe, that like a slowe and dull Asse it may be pricked forward to wroke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatchd of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continual pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Even to this vs David had respect, when he did set forth the Law with those notable praxies: The Law of the Lord is vndeiled, converting soules: the justices of the Lord are vp-right, and chearing harts: the commandement of the Lord is bright, that gaueth light to the eyes, &c. Again : A lantern to my feete is thy word, and light into my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Praise. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein he saith, notwithstanding the Law ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to give to man of it selfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with howe great profit the Lord doth instruct them by reading of his Lawe, to whom he inwardly insinueth a readinesse to obey. And he taketh hold not of the commandements onely, but also the promise of grace annexed

The third office of the law respesting properly them that are regenerated by the first set of grace, to first instruct them what the will of God is, and secondly to breed them thereon desirall more and more to goe forward in obferving iu. annexed to the things which onely maketh the bitterness to waie sweeke. For what were leffe amiable then the Law, if it should onely with requiring and threatening troublle foules carefully with feare, and vex them with terror? But specially David sheweth, that he in the Law conected the Mediatour, without whose there is no delire of sweetenesse.

Which while some vnskilfull men cannot discerne, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bide the two tables of the Law farewel, because they thinke it is not greeable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that containeth the ministration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart fare out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same Law which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to have a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly faide to the people: Lay your harte upon all the words that I doe teellthe to you this day, that ye may commit them to your children, that ye may teach them to kepe, to doe, and to fullfill all the things that are written in the volume of this Law, because they are not vainely commanded you, but that euery one should live in them. But if no man can deny that there ap-peareth in it an absolute patern of righteousnesse, then either we must have no rule at all to live justly and vprightly, or else it is not lawfull for vs to depart from it.
For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed.
Therefore, whereas David makes the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the Lawe, let vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the end of the world: and let vs not therefore be frayed away, or fliie from being instruited by it, because it appoynteth a much more exact holinesse that we shall performe, while we shall carry about the person of our body.
For now it executeth not against the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be satisfied, but with his full taskes performed: but in this perfection whereunto it exhorteth vs, it fieweth vs a marke, toward which in all our life to enduor, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our dutie. In which enduor if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will grant vs to attaine to that marke, toward which our enduers doe trauaile a farre off.

Now therefore, whereas the Law hath toward the faithfull a power to exhort, nor such a power as may binde their confciences with curse, but such as with often calling on, may shake off sluggishtnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to express this deliurance from the curse thereof, doe say, that the Law is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yeer of the Law morall) not that it doeth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them, which it was before, tharri, that it doe no more, by making affraide and confounding their confciences, daime and destroy them. And truly such an abrogation of the Lawe, Paul doth plainly teach, and also that the Lord himselfe speake of it, appereath by this that he would not have confuted that opinion that he should dissolu the Law, vntlles it had bene commonly recuened among the Lewes.
But forasmuch as it could not rife caufefullie and without any colour, it is likely that it grew upon faine vnderstanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errors are wont to take ocasion of truth, but least we should alfo fumble at the fame fone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the Lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroy the Law but to fulfill it: and that till heauen and earth paffe away, no one iote of the Law shoulde paffe away, but that all should be fulfilld: he sufficiently confirmeth, that by his coming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the Law. And for good caufe: sith he came rather for this ende, to helpe offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the Law remaineth for all Christians, inviolable, which by teaching, admonifhing, rebuking
rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to every good work.

15 As for those things that Paul speaketh of the curse, it is evident that they belong not to the very instruction, but only to the force of binding the conscience. For the Law not only teacheth, but also with authority requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yeaf if due be slack'd in any part, it bendeth his thunderboul't of curse. For this cause the Apostle faith, that all they that are of the workes of the Law, are subiect to the curse, because it is written: Curfed is every one, that fulfillleth not all. And he faith, that they be under the workes of the Law, that do not set righteousnesse in the forguenesse of sinnes, by which we are loo'ed from the rigour of the Law. He teacheth therefore that we must be loo'ed from the bonds of the Lawe, vnlesse we will miserably perish vnder them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and sharpe exacting, that relea'seth nothing of the extermity of the Law, and suffreth not any offence unpunished. From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeeme vs, he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Curfed is every one that hangeth upon the tree. In the chapter following in deed he faith, that Christ was made subiect to the Lawe, to take them that were vnder the Lawe, but all in one meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receive the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguith of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnthken, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authoritie of the Law, but that it ought full to be receiued of vs with the time reverence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which we abrogate not in effect, but in vs only. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an ende of them, doth so nothing diminish their holiness, that it rather feteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should have given but a vaine shew to the people, vnlesse the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had beene shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day determine to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to prooue that the keeping of them now is not only superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore how in the abolishing of them, the truth shineth better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile thrown before, shew a figure of Christ that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veil of the Temple at the death of Christ was torned in two pieces and fell downe: because now the true and express image of the heavenly good things was brought to light, which before had beene but vnder perfe&lie begun with darke rude draughts, as the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews faith. Hereunto struch that saying of Christ, that the Law and the Prophets were vom the time of Ioah, and that from that time forwardes, the kingdom of God began to be joyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of salvation, and of eternall life, but because a farre off, and vnnder shadowes oneely they did beholde which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behoued that the Church of God should clime vp higher from those first instructions, Ioah the Baptist declareth, for that the Law is given by Moses, but grace and truth began by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truly promis'd in the olde sacrifies, and the Arke of the covenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly favour of God, yet all this had bee ne but a shadowe, if it had not beene grounded upon the grace of Christ, where-in is found, perfect and eternall redemption. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall vurses of the Law haue cea'sed to be obseru'd, yet by the ende of them it is the better known how great was the profit of them before Christ's comming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

The bond of the law from which we are loo'ed are those exaction, the rigor and extremitie whereof, if it were not mitigated, would cause despaire, and not the continuations of obedience, the authoritie whereof death and must stand in force for ever.

Cap. 7. Of the knowledge of 17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noteth. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgiving you all youroffences, blotting out the handwritting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse, &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the lawe somewhat further that now we have nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expound it of the lawe morall whole vnpeecable vigor rather then doctrine thereof, they thinke to be taken away. Some more deeply waying the words of Paul, do efpie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremonial, and doth eue that this word Decree, doth more than once to signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he sayeth thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the lawe of commandements consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Jewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherefore I grant that these false expounders are rightfully reprooved by these: but ye see thinke that these do not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all to have these two places compared togeth in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the fop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept at a distance, that was in ceremonies. For the slages of washings & sacrifices, wherewith the Jewes were made holy vnto the Lord, do frewe them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, he teacheth that contrary further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to call it a hand writing against vs? moreover to set the whole sum in a manner of our redemption in this, that it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter is selfe trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trust that I haue attained the naturall understanding of it at least this be grantted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine wordes of the Apostle, that in the Jewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they else by sacrifices, but confesse themselues in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleanings in their place? What did they with their cleanings, but testifie themselfes to be vn cleane? And so was the handwriting of their sin & vn cleane?nes often renued by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which caufe the Apostle wrote that at length by meanes of the death of Christ, was perfoemned the redemption of the offences that remained under the olde testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthiely call the ceremonies handwrittings against those that observe them: forasmuch as by them they did openly fale to their owne damnation & vn cleane. And hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which then the Apostle doth feuer from Christ, because being at that time yeeld, they did obfuscate the glory of Christ. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselues, are well and fitly called handwrittings against the saluation of men, because they were as solemn instruments that testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian church to them againe: Paul did not wante cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what point they should fall backe againe, if they suffered themselfes in such sorte to bee yoked by them. For therewith all was the benefite of Christ wrested away from them, inasmuch as he having once performed the eternall cleansing, hath utterly abolished those daily observations which were onely of force to scale finnes, but could doe nothing to the putting away of them.

The viij. Chapter.

Exposition of the Morall Law.

Here I chinke it shall not be from the purpose, to enterlare the tene Commandements of the Law, with a short exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I haue touched, that the same keeping of them, and then also we shall haue besides that a proove of the second point, that the Jews did not onely learne by that what was the true force of godliness, but also by the terror of the judgement, sith they saw themselves unable to keepe it, they were compell'd whether they would or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Now in setting forth the summe of those things that are required in the true knowledge of God, we haue alreadie taught, that we cannot conceiue him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maiestie preseneth itselfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worship of him. In the knowledge of our selues we haue set this for the chiefe point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strength, and cleans stripped of the trust of our owne righteousness, and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with confidence of our owne neediness, wee should learne perfect humility and abasement of our selues. The Lord feteth forth both these points in the Law, where first challenging to himselfe due power to governe, he calleth vs to the reverence of his divine maiestie, and appointeth out vnto vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteousness, (against the righteousness whereof our nature as it is perverse and crooked, doth alwaies strive, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe it is weake and feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reprooveth vs both of weakenesse and unrighteousnes. Moreover, that inward law which we haue before said to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the harts of all men, doth after a certain manner enforme vs of the same things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conscience doth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witness and admonisher of those things that we owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and unlawfull, so accuseth vs when wee sworne from our duty. But man being wrapped in such darknesse of errors as he is, skarfe euell slenderly tafteth by that law of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truly he is very farre distant from the right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancy and ambition, and so blinded with selfeloue, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, descend into himselfe to learne to submit and humble himselfe, and confess his owne misery. Therefore (as it was necessarie both for our dulenes and stubbornesse) the Lord hath set vs a law written, which should both more certainly rufifie that which in the Law naturall was too obscure, and also should make away our dvousnesse, and more lively touch our minde and remembrance.

2 Now it is carie to understand what is to be learned of the Law, that is, that as God is our Creator, so of right he hath the place of our Father and Lord, and that by this reason we owe to him glory, reverence, love, and feare. Yea, and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to follow whither sober we that lust of our minde doth move vs, but that we ought to hang vpon his becke, and to rest only upon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that he delighteth in righteousness, that he abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore that vnto we will with wicked vnhankfulnes fall away from our creator, we must necessarily observe righteousnes all our life long. For if then only we yeeld to him the reverence that we owe, when we preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worship of him, but the observance of righteousnes, holinesse and cleanliness. Neither may we pretende this excuse that we want power, and like wafted detters be not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that we should measure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatsoever we be, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a lover of righteousnes, a hater of wickednesse. Whatsoever he requireth of vs (because he can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature we must of necessity obey: but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if we be holden bound of our owne lust wherein sinne raigneth, so that we are not looke at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why we should allege necessity for our defence, the evil whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our felues.

3. When we have thus farre profited by the teaching of the lawe, then must wee by the teaching of the same lawe also descende vnto our selues: whereby at length we may carry away two things. The first is, by comparing the righteousnesse of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to have place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckoned among his children. The second is, in considering our strength, to learne that it is not only sufficient to fullfil the law, but alfo utterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a difficullt of our owne strength, and a care and fearfullnesse of minde. For conscience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the judgement of God is present before it: and the judgement of God cannot be felt, but that it striketh into vs a dreadful horrore of death. And like wise being constrained with provoues of her owne weakenesse, it cannot choose but by and by fall into diplaire of her owne strength. Both these affections doe ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made afraide with feeling of eternall death, which he feareth to hang over him by the denounced of his owne righteousness, turneth himselfe to the only mercie of God, as to the onely hauen of saluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the law, despairing in himselfe, he may take breath againe and begin to crave and looke for helpe from elsewhere.

4. But the Lord not contented to have procured a reverence of his righteousnesse hath also added promises and threatenings to fill our hearts with love of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be movied with the onely beautie of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull Father of his tender kindnesse, to allure vs with sweetnesse of rewardes to love and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewardes laid vp for vertue, and that he shall not spend his labour in vain, who soever he be, that shall obey his commandements. He proclaimeth on the other side, that he not only abhorreth righteousnesse, but also that he shall not escape unpunished, for that he will be a reveuer of the contempt of his maisters, and to exhort vs by all meanes, he promiseth as well the blessings of this present life as also eternall blessednes to their obedience that keepe his commandements: and to the transgressors thereof, he threateneth both present miseries and the punishment of eternall death: For the same promise, (he that doth these things shall live in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the foule that sinneth, that same shall die:) do without doubt belong to the immortality or death that is come, and shall never be ended. Albeit, whereoever is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternall destruction. Of present blessings and curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penall ordinances appeareth the fouraigne cleanliness of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, besides his great loure love of righteousnesses, (which he cannot finde in his hart to defraude of her reward) there is also prooved by his marvellous bountifulnes. For whereas we and all ours are indebted vnto his Matrifte, by good right whatsoever he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due debt, but the payment of debt is not woorothe of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obedience, which we do not yeeld of our selves as things that were not due: but what those promises doe bring vnto vs, is partly fad alreadie, and partly shall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendations of righteousnes, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleafeth God: that the penall ordinarines are let for the more deteftation of vnaughtiousnes, left the finner deted with the sweete flatterings of vices, shoulde forget that the judgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Now whereas the Lord giuing a rule of perfect righteousness, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more readie to depart now and then divers forts of worshipping to winne his fauour withall. For in all ages that irreligions affeccioufion of religion, because it is naturally planted in the wit of man, hath thewed and yet doth fiew forth itself, that men do always delight to invent a way to obtaine righteousness before the word of God, whereby it commeth to passe that the commandements of the lawe haue but small place among the works that are commonly called good workes, whilst that innumerable rout of mens workes occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses than to restrain suche licentiousnesse, when after the publishing of the lawe he spake thus to the people: Gute heede, and heart all the things that I command thee, that it may bee well to thee and to thy children after thee for ever, when thou shalt do that which is good and pleasant before thy God. What I command thee, that oncely do: add not vnto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protestted, that this was his wifedom and vnderstanding before other nations, that he had received judgements, righteousness, and ceremonies of the Lord, he said further, Keepe therefore thy felfe and thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes have seen, and that at no time they fall out of thy hart. For, because God did foresee, that the Israelites would not rest, but that after they had received the lawe, they would beside it trauell in bringing fowth new righteousness, if they were not severely holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteousness, which should have beene the strongest staye to hold them backe, and yet they did not caufe from that boldnesse so much forbidden them. But what of vs? we are surely comprehended within the same charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his lawe the absolute doctrine of righteousness, yet we not contented therewith, do moniftrously trauelle with forging and cowning of newe good workes one uppon another. For the healing of this fault, the best remedie shall be, if this thought shall be steadifally settled in vs, that the law is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteousness: that therein is taught no righteousness, but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore newe forms of works are vainly attempted to winne the favoure of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such studye of good workes as wandreth out of the law of God, is an intollerable defiling of Gods righteousness and of the true righteousness. Augustine also faith most truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometime the mother and keeper, sometime the originnall of all vertues.

6 But when we have expounded the law of the Lord, then more fiddily and with more profitte shall that be confirmed which I haue before spoken of the office and vic Cap. 3. Of the knowledge of the law. But before that I begin to discourse every several commandment by itself, it shall be good now to give such lessons as serve to the universal knowledge thereof. First let us hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the law not only to outward honesty, but also to inward and spiritual righteousness. Which thing whereas no man can denie, yet there be few that truly mark it. That commandeth to peace, because they looke not upon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be witted. If any king doe by proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steal: in this case I grant that if a man doe only conceal in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steal, and do not commit any of these things in deed, he is out of the compass of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortal lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuitie; his commandements are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose is nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleanness of the hart) under the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, counteinge of another mans guile, and whatsoever is like to these. For inasmuch as he is a spiritual lawmaker, he speaketh no leeffe to the foule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the foule, are wrath and hatred: the theefe of the foule, is euill desire and counteousnes: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man lay) haue regard to intents and wils, and not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intents and wils, as have outwardly broken out. They wey with what intent every outward act hath bene done, but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man only withholdeth his hands frō offending. On the other fide (because the heavenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of minde is principally needful to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, even when they mightily dissemble their contempt of the law, do frame their eies, their feete, their hands, and all the parts of their bodyes to some observation of the lawes; in the meantime they hold their hart most farre off from all obedience, & thinke themselves well discharged, if they keepe close from men that which they doe in the sight of God. They heare it said: That shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steal: they draw not out their sword to kill: they iyoyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their hands upon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole harts they breath out murthers, they Boyle in lust, they cast their eies aside at all mens goods, and denoun them with coueting. Nowe weanteth that which was the chief point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so gross dulness, but that leaving the lawmaker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their owne wit? Against these doth Paul mightily cry out, affirming that the law is spiritual, whereby he meaneth, that it is not onely demanding an obedience of the foule, minde and will, but also requiriteth an Angelike purenesse, which having all the filthinesse of the flesh cleanse wiped away, may favour nothing but of the spirit.

When we say that this is the meaning of the lawe, we drivest not in a new exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expouer of the lawe. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, hee reprooueth this most perilous errour, and pronounceth that vnahte looking at a woman is fornication: hee protesteth that they are manlifiers that hate their brother, for hee maketh them guilty of judgement that haue but conceiued wrath in their minde, and them guilty of the couneel that in murmuring or grudging have utterd any token of a displeased minde: and them guilty of hell fire, that with taunts and railing brake foorth into open anger. They that haue not spied these things, haue fained Christ to be another Moses, the giver of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection fection of the lawe of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospel, which farre paffeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commandements, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonour the lawe of God. Truly it theweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocritical, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteousness. But it is very easie to confute that errour: for that they thought that Christ did addde into the lawe, whereas he did but restore the lawe to her integritie, while he made it free, and cleansed it being obscured with lies, and defiled with leaun of the Pharisees.

8. Let this be our second note, that there is alway more contained in the commandements and prohibitions, than is by words expressed, which yet is so to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licenciously wresting the Scriptures, wee may make of every thing what wee list. For many bring to passe by this unmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authority of Scripture growth in contempt, and others some despare of understanding it. Therefore if it be possible, we must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, we must I say search how farre our exposition may exceed the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeere that it is not an addition of mens gloates knitt to the worde of God, but rather that the pure and natural meaning of the laweguer is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commandements it is so manifest, that there are figurative speeches, meaning more in expressing part that he may woorthily be laughed at that will restrain the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober exposition doth passe beyonde the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth hard to judge, vndiste there be some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to bee the best measure, that it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in every commandement be wares, why it was gien vs. As for example: Euerie commandement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truth of both forces shall forthwith be found, if we consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the ende of the fift commandement is, that honour is to bee gien to them to whome God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commandement, that is right and pleaseth God, that wee honour them to whom he hath gien any excellencie, and that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the fift commandement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commandement shall be, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worship of his maiestie pleaseth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euerie commandement we must looke uppon what matter it treateth: then must we search our theede, till we finde what the lawemaker doth require therein properly to please or displease him: and last of all must wee drawe an argument from the sameto the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this displeaseth him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he command this, then hee forbideth the contrarie: if hee forbid this, then hee commandeth the contrarie.

9. That which is now somwhat darkly touched, shall in expounding of the commandements become very plaine by practice, wherefore it sufficeth to have touched it, fauing that this last point, is to be shortly confirmed with some prooves thereof, because otherwise either it should not bee understanded, or being understanded, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurditie. This needeth no prooves, that when a good thing is commaundede, the cuill is forbidden that is contrarie to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it me. And common judgement will not much sticke to admit, that when cuill things are forbidden, the contrarie duties are.
are commanded. It is an universal opinion that virtues are commended, when the contrary vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those forms of speech doe signify commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the virtue contrary to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrary duties and doings. Therefore in this commandement Thou shalt not kill, the common sense of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine from all hurt doing, or luft to doe hurt. I say that there is further contained, that we should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, leaft I speake without a reason, I prove it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or mislaid, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deece and precious unto vs: hee doth therefore require with all those duties of love that may be done or vs for the preservation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commandement doth alway disclose vnto vs all that we are therein commanded or forbidden to doe.

1o But why God, in such as it were halfe commandements, hath by figures rather secretely signified, than expresst what his will was, whereas there are woont to be many reasons rendered thereof, this one reason pleseth me above the rest.
Because the fith alway endeoureth to extenuate the sinne of sinne, and to colour it with false pretences, faying where it is even palpable for grossenesse, he hath set forth for an example in every kinde of offence that which was most wicked and abominable, at the hearing whereof our very senses might be mouned with horror, whereby to imprint in our minde a more hainous detestinge of euery sort of sinne.
This many times deceived vs in weying of vs, that if they be any thing secrete, we make them seeme small. These decretes the Lord doth disclose, when he accu-meth vs to referre all the whole multitude of vses to these principall heads, which doe best of all these, how much euery kinde is abominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought so hainous eues, when they are called by their owne names, but when they are forbidden vs under the name of manslaughter, wee better understand how abominable they are before God, by whose wordes they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and we moued by his judgement, doe accuftime our felues better to weighe the hainousnesse of those faults that before seemed but light vnto vs.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuing of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will judge that there is sometime mention made not vnfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And we have a cause reade, that doth not suffre vs to remaine in doubt of this matter. For God do deuised his law into two partes, in which is contained the whole righteousness, that he hath affigned the first to the duties of religion that doe peculiarly pertaine to the worshiping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of Charity which belong vnro men.
The first foundation of rightouesnes is the worship of God: which being once overthrown, all the other members of righteousness are termes in sunder and dissolud, like to the partes of an house vnointed and fallen downe. For what maner of right-ouesnes willeth thou call it, that thou vexeest not men with robberie and extortions, if in the meanie time by wicked sacrilege thou spoilest Gods maistie of his glorie? that thou defilest not thy bodie with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou pro-phanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou trauell unto destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteousness is vainly boasted of without religion, and makes no better shewes, than if a mangled bodie with the head cut off,should be brought forth for a beautifull sight. And religion is not onely the principal part of righteousness, but also the very soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie and loute among themselves without the scare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning

ning and foundation of righteousness, because when it is taken away, all the equitie continenice and temperance that men have among themselves is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the springhead and lusely breath of righteousness, because hereby men do leaue to live among themselves temporally and without hurt doing one to another, if they reverence God as the judge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth us to godliness and the proper duties of religion, wherewith his majestie is to be worshipped; in the other he prefenbeth how for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behave our selves in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Evangelists rehearfe it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall points, the one that we should love God with all our hart, with all our foule, with all our strength: the other, that we love our neighbour as ourselues. Thus thou seest how of the two parts wherein he concludeeth the whole lawe, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward men.

12. But although the whole lawe be contained in two principall points, yet to the ende to take away all pretence of excuse, it pleased our God to declare in the ten commandements more largely and plainly all things that belong both to the honor, feare and loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie which lhee commandeth vs to bear to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commandements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein euerie man ought to have his judgement free, for which we ought not contentiously to strive with him that thinketh otherwife. But we must needs touch this point, least the Readers should either forme or maruell at the diuision that we shall use, as new and lately decreed. That the law is diuided in ten words, because it is oft approb'd by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controversy, where there is no doubt of the number, but of the manner of diuiding. They so divide them, that they giue three commandements to the first table, and put other feaven into the second, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it vnnder the first: whereas without doubt it is severally set by the Lord for a commandement, and the tenth commandement of not counting the things of his neighbour, they doe fondly teare into two. Beside that it shal by and by be done to vnderstande, that such manner of diuining was vnknowne in the pure age. Other do reckon, as we do, foure severall commandements in the first table, but in places of the first they set the promis without the commandement. As for me, because vnlesse I be convinced by esuent reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandements, me thinkest I see so many diuided in very fit order. Therefore, leaning to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allow, that is, that the same which these later forse make the first commandement, shall be in stead of a preface to the whole lawe, and then shall follow the commandements, power of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shall be rehearsed. Augustine alio to Bonifice agree with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God onely be feared with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before severally spoken of the shadow with commandement of the Sabbath. In another place in deede that first diuision pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandements, the mysteries of the Trinity more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place he thinketh not to confesse that otherwise he rather liketh our diuision. Besides these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vpon Matthew is of our side. Isephus, undoubtedly according to the common content of his time, assigneth to either table five commandements. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the diuision of religion and charitie, and also is confirmed by the authoritie of the Lord himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the

That is the former table besides a general preface to the law, foure commandements are contained in the latter table. commandement of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Now let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no strange Gods before my face.

13. Whether you make the first sentence a part of the first commandement, or read it severally, it is indifferent unto me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth instead of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is need to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogated by contempt. Therefore God first of all pronounseth, that the maieftie of the law that he shall make, may never at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of arguments. First he challengeth to himselfe power and right of dominion, whereby hee may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessity obey him: then he feteth forth a promise of grace with sweetenesse thereof to allure them to studie of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefite that he did for them, to reprooue the Iewe of vnthankfulness, if they do not with obedience assist his kindnes. Under the name of Ichous, the Lord, is ment his authoritie and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him, and do abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought under the yoke of gods maieftie, because it were monstrous for vs to tickle to withdrawe our licues from under his government, out of whom we cannot be.

14. After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to drawe by onely necessity, he also allurseth with sweetenes in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutuall relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. Whereupon Christ pronouseth that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob have immortal life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I haue chosen you to be my people, not only to do you good in this present life, but also to give you the blessednes of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in duers places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchsafe to deal thus mercifully with vs, to call vs into the companie of his people, he chooseth vs (faith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people unto himselfe, a holy people, and should keep his commandements. From whence also commeth this exhortation: Bewee holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is derived that protesstation that is in the prophet: The soule honoureth the father, and the feruent honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my lone?

15. Now followeth the rehearfall of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to move vs, as the fault of vnhankfulness is more detestable even among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof being worthy to be had in remembrance for ever, should remaine in force with their posteritie. Moreover it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say that they were delivered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, that they should with obedience and readiness offer vnce honour him, the authour of their deliverance. Hee vseth also, (to the ende to holde vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himselfe with certaine titles, whereby he maketh his sacred maieftie to be differently known from all idols and forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our naturall inclination to vanitie, toynd with rash boldnes, that to soonge as God is named, our mind cannot take heed to itself, but that it by and by falleth away to some vain invention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this mischief, he setteth out his own godhead with certaine titles and so doth compasse vs, as it were within certaine grates, lest we shoulde wander hither and thither and rashly forge our felues some new God, if forsaking the living God, we should erect an idol. For this cause so oft as the Prophets meaneth properly to point out him, they clothe him, and as it were incloze him, within those markes, whereby he had opened himselfe to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when he is set in the temple of Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these and like formes of speech doe not binde him to one place or to one people, but are set only for this purpose, to stay the thoughts of the godly in that God, which by his covenant, that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himselfe, that is no way lawfull to vray from such a patern. But let this remaine steedfastly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deluerauce to this end, that the Hebrews might the more cheerfully give themselves to the God that doth right clame them vnto him. And we (least we should think that the same nothing belongeth to vs;) ought to consider, that the bondage of Egypt is a figure of the spiritual captituation, wherein we are all held bounde, vntill our heavenly Deliverer doe make vs free by the power of his name, and convey vs into the kingdom of libertie. As therefore when in the olde time he minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he delueraed them out of the intolerable domon of Pharaoh, whereby they were oppressed: so all those to whom at this day he proffeth himselfe a God, he doth now deluera from the deadly power of the dulle, which was in shadow signified by that corporeal bondage. Whereas there is no man, but his mind ought to be inflamed to harken to the lawe which he heareth to have proceeded from the lowerigne king. From whome as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they have also their ende appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say) but he ought to be raunished to harken to the lawemaker, to the keeping of whose commandements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortal life: by whose maruellous power and mercie, he knoweth himselfe to be delueraed out of the lawes of death.

16 After that he hath grounded and established the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commandement, That we have no strange Gods before him: The end of this commandement is, that God will onely have preeminence, and wholly enjoy his owne authority among his people. And that it may so be, he commandeth that there be farre from vs all vngodlie and superstitie, whereby the glorie of his godhead is either diminiished or obscured: and by the same reason he commandeth, that we worship and honor him with true endour of godliness. And the very simplicity of the words themselves doe in a manner express the same. For we cannot have God, but we must also comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas then fore he commanded vs to have other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we should not give away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe unto God be innumerable, yet not vruitfully they may bee brount into vs, according to the principal points of Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging upon it, is adioned spiritual obedience, or submission. Adoration I call the reverence and worship which every one of vs yeedeth unto him, when he submitteth himselfe to his greatnesse: whereby we doe not without caule make this: part there of, that we yield our conferences submission to his lawe. Affiance is an instant acte of resting in him by acknowledgeing of his powers, when reposing all in him, we righteoutly power, truth and goodnesse in him, we think our felues blessed by only partaking of him. Invocation is a setting of our minde

Ez. 37. 16.

The first commandement whereunto we are to fasten so as to have one God, even the Lord, and none other then him, and to worship him in spirit and in truth. For there is no man, but he ought to be raunished to harken to the lawemaker, to the keeping of whose commandements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortal life: by whose marvellous power and mercie, he knoweth himselfe to be delueraed out of the lawes of death.
Of the knowledge of mind to his faith and helpe as to our onely succour, so oft as any necessitie preseth vs. Thankesgiving is a certaine thankfulnesse whereby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God sufffereth nothing to be conveyed away elsewhere, so he commaunded all to be wholly giuen to himselfe. Neither shall it bee ynowe to abstaine from hauing any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy felfe in this, that many wicked contemners are woont, which thinke the readieft way, to scorne all religions: but true religion must goe before, whereby our minde may be directed to the living God, with knowledge whereof they being endued may aspire to reverence, feare and worship his majestie, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, every where, to seeke for his helpe, to reknowledge and aduaunce with confession of praise the magnificence of his worke, as to the onely marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superition, whereby our minde swarminge from the true God, are drawn hither and thither as it were vnto diuers gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before saide, that all forged gods are to be druen farre away, and that the worship is not to be torne in fnder, which hee alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glorie, be it never so little, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The parcel of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaeth the hainonfes: for that God is prouoked to icalloufe, so oft as wee transte our owne inventions in his place, as if an vnchaftie woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eies shoulde the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power and grace hee looked vpon the people that hee had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he gieth them warning, that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is winneffe and beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is encreaeth with much wickednes, that man thinke that in his flyings away he can beguile the eies of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoever wee purpofe, whatsoever wee goe about, whatsoever wee pratiſfe, it commeth in his sight. Let thereforwe our confence be cleane even from the moft secret thoughts of swarminge from him, if we will haueour religion to please the Lord. For he reuereth to haue the glorie of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not onely in outward confession, but alfo in his eies, which doe behold the moſt secret corners of harts.

The Second Commandement

Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heaven above or in earth beneath, or in the water under the earth, Thou shalt not worship them, nor serve them.

17. As in the first commandement he pronounced that he is the one God beside whom there are no other gods to bee deuided or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kind of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The ende therefore of this commandement is, that hee will not have the lawfull worship of him, to bee prophaned with superstitious visages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is woont to invent, when it conceiuieth God according to her owne groffenesse. And therefore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spiritual worship, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the groſſeſt fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatrie. And there be two parts of this commandement. The first refraine our libertie, that we do not presume to make subject to our fenes or by any form to to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second part forbiddeth not to honour any images for religious sake. Moreover he shortly reciteth all the former wherein he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the profane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heaven, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Stars, and peraduenture also birds, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Determoneim he meaneth as well birds as stars. Which note I would not have spoken of but that I sawe some unskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other parts, because they are sufficiently known of themselves. And we have already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible forms of God man doth invent, they are directly contrary to his nature; and that therefore so soone as images come forth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penall ordinance that followeth ought not a little to auail to shake off our slothfulness. For he threateneth: That he is the Lord our God, a strong and jealous God, that visiteth the iniquitie of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and theeweth mercie vnto thousands to them that love him and keepe his commandements. This is as much in effect, as if he should have said, that it is he only vpon whom we ought to sticke. And to bring vs therunto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punish:it suffer it selle to be condemned or diuinified. Here is indeed set the name El, which signifieth God. But because it is derived of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfeious that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he will be a reuenger of his maustie and glory if any do transfer it to creatures or to grauen images, and that not with a short or slender revenge, but such as shall extend to the children and childrens children, and children childrens children, that is such as shall be followers of their fathers vngodlines: as also he theeweth a perpetuall mercie and bountifulnes unto long continuance of posteritie, to those that love him and keepe his law. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the conjunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiuetb vs into the bosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stande by mutual faithfullnes. As he doth all the duties of a faitfull and true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such love and chastitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeld not our soules to Saran, but to vs, and to filde the desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostafe of the leues, complaunteth that they did throw away chastitie, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaste that he himselfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wives minded in time to a strange lover: so the Lord that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in truth, seeketh that he hath a most fervent burning inickie, so oft as neglecting the purenes of his holy mariage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transfer to any other, or do infect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to be most vn corrupted: Forasmuch as by this meanes we do not onely breake the faith giuen in wedlocke, but also do defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be seen what he meaneth by this, when he saith, that he will visit the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, besides that he standeth not with the equitie of Gods justice, to punnish the innocent for an others offence, God himselfe also saith, that he will not make the fonn to bear the wickednesse of the Father. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sinnes of the ancestors vpon the generation to come. For he doth Moses oftentimes saith vnto him: Lord, Lord, thou hast rendered the iniquitie of the fathers vnto the children, vnto the third and fourth generation. Likewise Hieremie: Thou that shewest mercie in thousandes, that renderest... rendered the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of the children after them. Many, while they travail much in loosing this knot, think it is to be understood only of temporal punishments, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absolution, for as much as they are oftentimes laide upon them for their salvation, which is in deedo true. For Esay declared to Ezekial, that his fonnes should be spoiled of the kingdom, and carried into exile for the sinne that he had committed. The houses of Pharaoh and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleged for abyllyng of this question, it is rather a shift than a true exposition. For here and in like places he threateth a more gretuous revenge than it may be limitted within the boundes of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that the iuft curse of the Lord lieth not onely upon the head of the wicked man himselfe, but also upon his whole familie: when the curse once lieth upon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being deitifie of the spirit of God, liues most wickedly, and the sonne likewise, for taken of the Lord for the fathers fault, do follow the same way of destruction, and finally the childe child, and the childe of the childe child, the cursed seed of detestable men do fall headlong after them?

20 First let vs see, whether such revenge be vnspeeably for the iustice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lord would not afeath not to communicate his grace. Nevertheless they do perish by their owne vniughteousnes, and not by vniughteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any caufe to quarrell. Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to salvation as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laide upon wicked men and cuill doers for their offences, that their houses are depruned of the grace of God during manie generations: who can accuse God for this most iust revenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounces, that the punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe over unto the lon. Note what is there intreated of. When the Israelites had beene long and continually vexed with manie calamites, they bended to vs for a Prouerb, that their fathers had eaten a lower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deferring it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeasable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate scerne. The Prophet pronounces vnto them that it is not so: because they are punished for their owne offences, and that it standeth not with the iustice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other helpe of salvation: in this that the children being blined and forsaken of him, do goe on in the steps of their fathers, they sustaine curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, and at laft to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the iust judgemen of god, not for the sins of other, but for their owne iniquitie.

21 On the other side is offered a promisse of enlarging the mercie of God into a thousand generations, which promisse is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemn covenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon having respect vnto, wrighteth that the children of the righteous shall be blest after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also is not a little auxilieth thereunto, but also for that blest promised in the covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon growth great comfort to the faithfull, great terror to the wicked. For if even after death, the remembrance both of righteousnes and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto... unto posterity, much more shall it light and rest upon the heads of the doers themselves. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times commeth to good prove, and the issue of the faithfull swarreth out of kinde: because the Lawmaker meant not here to stablith such a perpetual rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terror of the sinner, that the penalty is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For the temporal punishments that are laid vpon a few wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinne, and of the judgement that shall one day be giuen vpon all sinners, although many escape unpunished even to the end of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifulness to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a prove of his constant and perpetuall favour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednes of the father in the sonne, he sheweth what judgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which asurcednesse he had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way hee commendeth vnto the largenesse of his mercie, which he extendeth vnto a thousand generations, whereas he assigned but onely foure generations to vengeance.

The third Commandement.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

22 The ende of this commandement is, that his will is to have the maientie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the sonne shall be that we do not desile it with contemptuously and irreurently vsing it. With which prohibition the commandement hangeth orderly together, that we take stedy and care godlyly to reuerence it. Therefore we ought so to order our tongues both in our minde and in our toonges, that we neither thinke nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his minsteries, but reverently and with much obtricietie: that in veying his worke, we conceive nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that whatsoever our minde conceiueth of him, whatsoever our tongu vtereth, it may flauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may servc to advance his magnificence. That we doe not rashly or disordered abuse his holy worde and reverend mysteries either to ambition, or to contentiousnesse, or to our owne triflinges: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepes their honor and estimation among vs. Last of all, that we doe not carpe against or speake euill of his worke, as thefe wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully against them: but that whatsoever we rehearce done by him, we report it with words of praise of his wisedome, righteousnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is deslued with vaine and puerufl euill, because it is violently carried from the right vse whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much euill in this rash readiness to vse the name of God out of seacon, much more mischief is in this, if it be employed to euill vses, as they doe that make it to servce the superstititions of Necromancie, cruel execrations, unlawful comiurations, and other wicked enchantments. But swearing is chiefly mentioned in the commandement, as the thing wherein the puerufl abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby we may be the better altogether frayned away from all desiling thereof. But that here is commandement giuen of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the truth and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he afterwarde in the second table condemmeth perjurie and falsie witnesse, whereby hurt is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repeat it againe, if this commandement intreated of the dutie of charitie. And also the division of the Law it false requireth it, because as it is said, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his Law, whereby is gathered that in this commandement he challengeth his own right to himselfe, and defendeth the holiness of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

The honor which God requireth to be given to his name in others.

23 First it is to be learned what is an oth. It is a taking of God to witnesse, to confirm the truth of that which we speake. For those cursed speecches that containe manifest reproches against God, are vnworthie to be reckened among othes. That such taking to witnesse, when it is rightly done, is a kind of worshipping of God, is shewed in diverse places of the Scripture. As when Esay propheseth of the calling of the Assyrians and Egyptians into fellowship of the covenant with Israel, They shall speake (faith he) in the toong of Canaan, and shall swear in the name of the Lord. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shall yeede a confession of his religion. Againe, when he speake of the enlargment of his kingdom, his faith: Whose our shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithful: and he that shall swear in the land shall swear in the true God Jeremeie faith, if they shall teach the people to swear in my name as they have taught them to swear by Baal, they shall be builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is said, that when we call vp on the name of the Lord to witnesse, wee doe witnesse our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall and unchangeable truth, whom we call upon, not onely as a most substantal and witnesse of truth above all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knowet of harts. For where testimonies of men doe faile, there we flee to God for witnes specially where any thing is to be prooued that lyeth secret in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly an-grie with them that swear by strange Gods, and he judgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue for taken me, and doe swear by them that are not gods. And he declareth the hao multis of of this offence by the threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that swere by the name of the Lord, and swere by Melechim.

Perjurie, a pro-phation of the name of God.

24 Now then we understand that it is the Lords will that there be in our othes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent heed is to be taken, that in stede of worshipping they doe not conteine dishonour, contempt or abasement of it. For it is no small dishonor, when perjurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lord when he is spoyle of his truth? he shall then cease to be God. But truly he is spoyle thereof, when he is made an affirmere and approoer of falshood. Wherefore, when Isuas minded to drue Achan to confesse the truth, he said: My Sonne, giue glory to the Lord of Isrrel, meaning thereby, that the Lord is generously dishonored if a man swere fals-ly by him. And no murrell. For we doe as much as in vs lyeth, in a manner to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speech was vued among the Jews so often as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharifecs vied in the Gospell of John. To this needfulnesse the forme of othes that are vied in the Scriptures doe instruct vs: The Lord lueth, The Lord doe these things vnto me, and adde these things, The Lord be witnesse vpon my soule. Which doe prooue, that we cannot call God for witnesse of our sayings, but that we also with him to take vengeance of our perjurie, if we speake deceitfully.

The name of God abused when vied as a name though a name.

25 The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is vied in superfluous othes, although they be true. For in suche case it is also take in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsely, vntlesse we doe also remember, that swearing was suffered and ordained not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull use thereof, that apply it to things not nece.

And therefore they goe beyond the lawfull use thereof, that apply it to things not necessary. And there can no other necessity be pretended, but where it is to serve either religion or charity, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiousely offence, and so much the more intolerably, for that by very custome it hath ceased to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the judgement state of God is not slenderly weyed. For every where without regarde, the name of God is defiled in trifling talkes, and it is not thought that they doe eull, because by long suffered and unpunished boldnesse, they are come to reft as it were in possession of so great wickednes. But the commandement of the Lorde remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day have his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall revenge proclaimed against them that use his name in vaine.

This commandement is also transgresed in another point, that in our othes wee put the holy feruants of God in the place of God, with manifest yngodliness, for so we transferre the glorie of his Godhead to them. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath given a speciall commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not be heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call upon a higher than themselves, and that God which had none greater than his owne glory to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptistes not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is general: Isay vnto ye, sweare not at all, but let your tale be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoever is more than this, is of eull. But by this means, they doe without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his Father, and as if he had come downe from heauen to repeale his Fathers decree. For the eternall God doth not onely in the Law permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were enough: but also in necessitie doth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his Father: that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his Father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterward forbid and condemn the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let vs a little weigh them. But herein we shall neuer attaine the truth, vnlesse wee bend our eyes vnto the intent of Christ, and take heede vnto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not eftet to release or restraine the Law, but to reduce it to the true and natural understanding, which had beene very much depreated by the false gloyes of the Scribes and Pharisies. This if we holde in minde, we shall not think that Christ did vnterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which doe transgresse the rule of the Law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbeare no manner of swearing but perjuries, whereas the Law doth not onely forbid perjuries, but also all idle and superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expostor of the Law, doth adornith them, that it is not only eull to forsweare, but also to sweare. But how to sweare?

Note: In truth, yet manera

the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect forms doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme or other tokens of Gods liberalitie towards them. Neither doeth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confute their sophistical suttleteie, which thought it no fault babblingly to throw out indirect othes, as though they spured the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benefits. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deceived that thinking forms of swearing by the life or loue of the king: for then the false making of Gods doth obscure and minish the glorie of the one onely God. But when we meane onely, to procure credite to our sayings by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trilling othes his majestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousynece, all pretencie of excuse, in this that he forbiddeth to sweare at all. And James to the same pynpoufe, reciting the same wordes of Christ which I haue before alleaged, because the fame rash boldnesse hath aways beene in the worlde, which is a prophane misusing of the name of G O D. For if we refer this word, at all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare: wherefore ferueth that expozition which is added afterwarde: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those caullations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

27 Therefore it cannot nove bee doubtfull to sounde judgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprooue those othes that were forbidden by the law. For hee himselfe which shewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that hee taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his disciples, who we doubt not did obey their matter in all things, followed the same example: who dare say that Paul would haue sworne, if sheaing had bee vnitely forbidden? but when the matter so required, hee sweare without any sticking at it, yea, sometime adding an execution. But this question is not yet ended, because some doe thinke that onely publicke othes are excepted out of this prohibition, as those othes that we take when the Magistrate doth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vs to take in establisshing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the Souliar when he is put to an oath for his true service in the war, and such like. And to this sort they adioyne, and that rightfull, such othes as are in Paul, to confirm the dignitie of the Goypell, for as much as the Apostles in their office are not private men but publicke ministers of God. And truly I denie not that those are the safest othes, because they are defended with sounde testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commandd in a doubtfull case to discer the witnesse to an oath, and he on the other side to answer by oath: and the Apostle saith, that mens controversies are by this meaned ended. In this commandement both these have a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and we may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publicke and Solemne oath was in great reuerence, but common othes that were usuall spoken without consideration, were either nothing or verie little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the majestie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemn private othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holy, and reuerently taken, which are maintaine both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for private men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as judge between them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endourest to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and he by no meanes will suffer himselfe to be satisfied. If thy good good name come in perill by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the judgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie knowne. Now if the weight of the words be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to wittesse. Therefore I see not why in this case we should affirmne, that the calling him to wittesse is unlawfull. And were are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Iesu with Abimeth be said not to suffer for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Jacob and Laban were priuate men, which stablished a covenent with mutuall othe betweene themselues. Booz was a priuate man which by the same meanes confirmed his promisse of marriage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate man, a iuft man and fearing God, which affirmed unto Elias by oth, the thing that he meant to perwade him. Therefore I have no better rule, but that othes be fo tempered, that they be not vn-aduised, that they be not common without regarde, that they be not vse of raging lust, nor trifling, but that they leue iust necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commandement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Sabboth day. Sixe daies shalt thou worke and doe all thy works. But on the seuenth day is the Sabboth of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt doe no workes.

28 The ende of this Commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affection and workes, should be buried in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordaine. But because this Commandement hath a peculiar and severall consideracion from the rest, therefore it must have also a severall maner of exposition. The olde writers vse to call it a shadow with Commandement, for that it contenoth the outward obseruation of the day, which by the comming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherin I grant that they say truly, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I thinke) I have marked that there are three causes to be considerede, whereupon this Commandement consisteth. For first the heavenly lawmakere meant vnder the rest of the seuenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spirituall rest, whereby the faithfull ought to escape from their owne workes, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondly, his will was to have one appointed day, wherein they should meete together to heare the Law, and execute the ceremonies, or at least be able to peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercized to godlines. Thirdly, he thought good to have a day of rest granted to seantants, and such as liued vnder the government of other, wherein they might have some ceasing from their labor.

Three causes considerable in the fourth commandement concerning the obseruation of the Sabboth day.

The Sabboth a figure of spiritual rest. The Sabboth was the principal point in the Sabboth. For the Lords required the keeping of no Commandement in a manner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is overthrown, then he complaineth that his Sabbothes are polluted, destitute, nor kept, nor sanctified: as though that piece offering being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honored. He did set foorth the observing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithfull did among other oracles manuellly esteeme the reuellings of the Sabbothes. For in Neh. monies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commandments of the law. All which things do refer to set forth the dignity of the mystery, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezekiel. Thus you have in Exodus; see that yee keep my Sabbath day, because it is a token betweene me and you in your generations: that you may know that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keep my Sabbath, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keep the Sabbath and celebrate it in their generations, it is an everlasting covenant betweene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezekiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should know that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may work in vs: we must depart from our owne will, we must renounce vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our own wit, that we may haue God working in vs: that we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

This perpetuall ceasing was represented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be obserued with greater devotion, the Lord commanded with his owne example. For it auaileth not a little to shew vp mans endeavour, that he may know that he tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause choen to signifie everlafting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, makest an end of describing the succeeding of daies and nightes. There may be also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabbath should never be perfectly ended, till it can to the last day. For in it we begin our blessed rest, in it we do daily proceede in profiting more and more. But because we haue full a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntill that saying of Esau be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of new Moone with new moone, of Sabbath with Sabbath, even then when God shall be in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the sabbath day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbath at the last day, that our whole life might by continual mediation of the Sabbath aspire to this perfection.

If any man mislike this obseruation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordained one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the lawe be exercised to the continual meditation of the spirituall rest: And that he assigned the seuenth day, either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting forth the likeness of his own example, he might the better move the people to keepe it or at least to put them in mind, that the Sabbath tended to no other end, but that they should become like vnto their creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the mystery remaineth which is therein principally set forth, concerning the perpetuall rest of our works, to consideration whereof the Prophets did now and then call backe the Iewes that they should not thinke themselues discharget by carnall taking of their rest. Before the places alreadie allledged, you haue thus in Esay: If thou turne away thy foode from the Sabbath, that thou do not thinke owne will in my holy day, and shall call the Sabbath delicate and holy of the glorious Lord, and that glorifie him while thou doest not thinke owne waies, and feelest not thinke owne wil to speake the worde, then shall thou be delited in the Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures do vanish away, he is the bodie at sight whereof the
But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to be reckoned among the old shadowes, but do belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbath is abrogated, yet this hath still place with vs, that we should meete at appointed daies to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mysticall bread, and to publicke prayer: and then that to servants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commanding the Sabbath, the Lord had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely ye de of the Iewes to prooue it. The second, Moses spake in Deuteronomie these words: that thy man servant and thy maide servant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Egypt. Againe, in Exodus: that thy Ox and thy Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can deny that both these things do serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commended vs by the worde of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently known in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed and haue their ordinarie daies, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to bee done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it off, that comine and order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it be disordered. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releas whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing unto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no leffe to provide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt saie, why doe we not rather daily meete together, that the difference of daies may be taken away? I would to God that were granted, and truly spiritual wisely doe was a thing worthy to have daily a piece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakenes of many to have daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see laide vpon vs by the will of God?

33 I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirits do cause trouble, concerning the Sunday. They cri out that the Christian people are nourished in Jewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of daies. But I anfwer, that we keepe those daies without any Jewishnesse; because we doe in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For we keepe it not with straite religion as a cerimonie, wherein we thinke a spirituall mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessarie remedy to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be judged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galatians, because they did still observe daies. And to the Romans he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betwixt two daies, and daies. But who, sauing these, made men onely doth not see, of what obseruing the Apostle meaneth? For they had no regard to this politicaall ende and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them still as shadowes of spirituall things, they did even so much darken the glorie of Christ and the light of the Gospell. They did not therefore cease from handling works, because they were things that did call them away from holy Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of holy studies and meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from work they did dreame that they still kept their mysteries of old time deliuered them. The Apostle, I faie, inuicteth against this disordered difference of daies, and not against the lawfull choice of daies that ferueth for the quietnesse of Christian fellowship: for in the Churches that he himselfe did ordaine, the Sabbat was kept to this vse. For he appointeth the \textit{Corinthians} the same day, wherein they should gather the collection to relieue the brethren at \textit{Jerusalem}. If they fear superstition, there was more danger thereof in the feast daies of the \textit{Iewes}, than in the Sundayes that the Christians now haue. For so as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of superstition, the day that the \textit{Iewes} religiously obsuerued is taken away: and, so as was necessarie for keeping of cominline, order, and quiet in the Church, another day was appointed for the same vse.

34 Albeit the old fathers have not without reason of their choice, put in place of the Sabbath day, the day that we call Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the \textit{Lorde} is the end and fulfilling of that rest, whereof the old Sabbath was a shadow: the Christians are by the verie same day that made an end of shadowes, put in mind that they should no longer thicke vnto the shadowe to ceremonie. But yet I doe not so rest upon the number of seauen, that I would binde the Church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that haue other solemn daies for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applied to the observation of Discipline and well appointed order. Let the sum hereof be this: as the truth was gien to the \textit{Iewes} vnder a figure, so is it delivered vs without any shadowes at all. First, that in all our life long we should be in meditation of a continual Sabbath or rest from our owne works, that the \textit{Lorde} may worke in vs by his spirit: then that every man privately so oft as he hath leisure, should diligently exercise himselfe in godly calling to minde the worke of God, and also, that we all shoulde keepe the lawfull order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the worde, for the ministration of the Sacraments and for publike prayer: thridly, that we should not vngenerously oppresse them that be vnder vs. And so do the mislings of the false prophets vanish away that in the ages past have infected the people with a Jewishe opinion, that so much as was ceremonial in this commandement is taken away, which they in their toong call the appointing of the seuenthe day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproch of the \textit{Iewes} to change the day, and to keepe still the same holinesse in their minde. For there still remaineth with vs the like signification of mysterie in the daies as was among the \textit{Iewes}. And truly we see what good they have done by such doctrine. For they that cleane to their constitutions, do by these as much exceed as the \textit{Iewes} in grotte and carnall superstition of Sabbat: so that the rebukings that are read in \textit{Esay}, do no lesse sitte oner for them at these daies, than for those that the Prophet reprooued in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that least religion shoulde fall away or waxe faint among vs, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outward helps are to be vsed that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God.

The fifth Commandement.

_Honour \textit{thy} Father and \textit{thy} Mother, that thou mayst live long upon the lande which the Lord thy God shall give thee._

35 The end of this commandement is, that because the Lord delieth in the preservation of his order, therefore he willeth that those degrees of preeminence which he hath ordained be not broken, the summe therefore shall bee that we reverence those those whom the Lord hath set over vs, that we yeeld to them honour, obedience and thankfulness. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden vs, to withdraw any thing from their dignity, either by contempt or obstinacie or unthankfulness. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie verie largely: as when the Apostle saith, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not only that reverence is due vnto them, but also such recompence as their ministerie deserves. And because this commandement of subjection, doth most of all disagree with the perversenesse of mans nature, which as it swellith with greedinesse of climbing high, so it hardly abideth to be brought lowe: therefore he hath set that kind of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable and least envious: because he might the easieuer meeken and reclame our minde to the vs of submission. Therefore the Lord doth by little and little traine vs to all lawfull subjection by that which is most easie to bear, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom he gueeth any preeminence, he doth communicate his owne name with them, so farre as is necessarie to preserve the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, do so belong vnto him alone, that so oft as we heare one of them named, our minde must needs be touched with a feeling of his majestie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these things, he maketh to glistre with a certaine sparkle of his brightness, that they may be honorable euer one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our Father we have to consider somwhat of the nature of God, because he beareth not the name of God without cause. He that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a general rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinance set vnto him reverence, obedience, thankfulness, and such other duties as it lieth in vs to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or unworthy. For of what sort soever they be, they haue not without the providence of God attained that place, by reason whereof the lawmaker would haue them to be honored. Yet namely he hath giuen commandement of reverence to parents, that haue brought vs into this life, to which reverence very nature ought in a manner to infringe. For they are monsters and not men, that make the authoritie of parents with disdain or stubbornenesse. Therefore the Lord commanded all the disobedient to their parents, to be slaves, as men vnworthy to enjoy the benefite of light, that do not re-knowledge by whose means they came into it. And by manic additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reverence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lord establisheth when he commandeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The second he confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the fifteenth of Matthew, that it is the commandement of God that we do good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in mind, how acceptable vnto God is the submission that is here commanded. For Paulus vseth the same pricke to stirre vp our dulnesse when he saith: that this is the first commandement with promise. For the promise that went before in the first Table, was not special and properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole lawe. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the land which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of land was a pledge of Gods bountifulnes: let vs not make it if it pleased God to declare his favor by giving length of life, by which a man might long enjoy enjoy his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus: Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayest enjoy the possession of that lande that shall be vnto thee for a testimonie of my favour. But as all the earth is blessed to the faithful, we doe worthily reckon this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doth likewise belong vnto vs, forso much as the continuance of this life is a proofe of God's good will. For it neither is promised to vs, nor was promised to the Jews, as though it contained blesseynesse in it selfe, but because it is wonto be to the godlie a token of God's tender loue. Therefore if it chance that an obedient child to his parents be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seene, yet doth God no leffe constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should reward him with a hundred Acres of land, to whom he promised but one Acre. All consisteth in this, that we should consider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blesseynge of God, and that it is his blesseynge so farre as it is a proofe of his favour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnessse and shew in effect to his seruants.

Moreover, when the Lord promiseth the blesseynge of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reverence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most affliert cursed hangeth over the stubborne and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: hee pronounceth them by his lawe subject to the judgement of death, and commandeth them to be put to execution: if they escape that judgement, he himself taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see how great a number of that sort of men are flame in battels and in fraines, and some other tormented in strange vnaccustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a proofe that this threatening is not vaine. But if any escape to olde age, yee in this life being deprived of the blesseynge of God, they do nothing but miserably languish, and are referred for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blesseynge promised to the godly children. But this is also by the way to be noted, that we are not commanded to obey them but in the Lord. And that is evident by the foundation before laced: for they sit on high in that place whereunto the Lord hath advanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is vned toward them, ought to be a step toward the honouring of that soueraigne Father. Wherefore if they moue vs to transgress the lawe, then are they worthy not to be accounted parents, but strangers that labour to withdraw vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lords, and all fortes of superiours. For it is shamefull and against conceuenece of reason, that their preeminence shoulde preuail to preffe downe his highnesse, with theirs as it hangeth wholly vpon it, so ought onely to guide vs vnto it.

The fixt Commandement.

Thou shalt not kill.

The fixes commandement, requiring to the owne & their children the safety of all mankinde, both under the name of murder both sodild all hurt & enmyng all furtherance which may grove from man to man:

39 The ende of this commandement is, that forasmuch as God hath bound together all mankinde with a certeine vnitie, that every man ought to regard the safety of all men, as a thing given him in charge, in summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours bodie may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our trauaille to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that we procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurt, & if they be in any danger, that we give them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so faith, then thinke withal that his his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a fonde thing to thinke, that he which epich the thoughts of the heart, and principally refeeth vsuou them, shoulde instruct nothing but the bodie to true rightcouinesse. Therefore the manslaughter of the hart is also forbidden in this law, and an inward affection to preferue oue brothers life is here given in commandement. The hande in deede bringeth forth the manslaughter, but the minde conceueth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without burning in desire to do him hurt. If thou canst not be angrie with him, then canst thou not hate him, forasmuch as hatred is nothing but an old rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy serf by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt still daile out with shifts to defend it, it is alreadie pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghost, that he is a manflayer that hateth his brother in his hart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Christ, that he is guilty of judgement that is angrie with his brother: that he is guilty of the counsell that faith Rhacha: that he is guilty of hell fire, that faith vnto him, Foole.

40 The Scripture noteth two points of equitie, vpon which this commandement is grounded: because man is both the image of God and our owne flesh, wherefore vnlesse we wil define the image of God, we must haue care to touch man none otherwise, than as a sacred thing: and vnlesse we will put off all naturalnes of man, we must cherish him as our owne flesh. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Christ, shall be intreated of in another place. God willed these two things naturally to be considered in man, that might perwade vs to the persuasion of him, that we should both reverence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our owne flesh. Hee hath not therefore escaped the crime of manslaughter, that hath kept him selue from shedding of bloud. If thou commit anie thing indeed, if thou go about any thing with endeuour, if thou conceive any thing in desire and purpose that is against the safetie of an other, thou art holde guilty of manslaughter. And againe: If thou do not trauell to thy power and as occasion may serue to defend his life, thou dost with like hainousnes offend the law. But if there be so much care taken for the safetie of his bodie, let vs hereby gather, how much studie and trouaile is due to the safetie of his soule, which in the Lords sight doth infintely excell the bodie.

The seuenth Commandement.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

41 The ende of the commandement is, that because God louch chaffitie and cleaneenesse, therefore all vnclaneenesse ought to depart farre away from vs. The same therefore shall be, that we be defiled with no vnclaneenes or lustfull intemperance of the flesh. Whereunto answere the affirmative commandement, that we chaffe and continelie order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbiddeth by name, to which all vnchaffe lust tendeth: that by the filthinesse of that which is more groffe and senfible, for somuch as it also defileth the bodie, he might bring vs to abhorre all filthy lust. Sith man was created in this estate, not to liue a solitarie life, but to vfe a helper ioyned vnto him: and since that by the curse of sinne he is driven the more to this necessitie, the Lorde hath in this behalfe provided helpe for him somuch as was sufficient, when he ordained marriage, when he sanctifieth with his blessing the fellowship begunne by his authoritie. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowship of man and woman out of marriage, is accursed before him: and that the fellowship of marriage it selfe, was ordained for remedie of necessitie, that we should not
Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of not run out into unbridled lust. Therefore let us not flatter our selves, for we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of marriage, without the curse of God.

42 Now forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more enkindled since the fall of man, we are become doubly subject to desire of companie of women, except it be those whom God of his singular grace hath exempted from it: let every man looke well what is giuen vnto him. Virginitie, I grant, is a vertue not to be despight: but such it is to some denided, and to some granted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and striving with it, cannot get the upper hand, refort to the helpe of marriage, that so they may keepe chastitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot concieve this worde, if they doe not licenc their owne intemperance with the remedie that is offered and granted them, they strive against God and resist his ordinance. And let no man carpe against me (as many do at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can do all things. For the helpe of God is present onely with those, that walke in his wayes, that is in their vocation from which they do withdraw themselfes, which forsaking the helps of god, do travaile to overcome and maistrie their necessitie with vaine rath boldnesse. The Lord affirneth that continencie is a singular gift of God, and of that sort that are not giuen generally, nor vnilerfully to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he faith, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that have gelded themselves for the kingdom of heauen, that is, that they might the more looably and freely apply themselfes to the affaires of the heavenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a little before, that all men are not able to receive it, but they to whom it is peculiarly giuen from heauen, whereupon he concluded: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirneth it more plainly, where he writeth, that evry man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, and another thus.

43 Whereas wee are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in euerie mans power to keepe chastitie in single life, although with studie and travaile he endeavour so much vnto it, and that it is a peculiar grace, which God giueth but to certaine men, that he may have them the more readie to his worke: doe wee not strive against God and nature which he hath instituted, if we doe not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleaneffe and chastitie of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way, that evry man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despitely marry as a thing vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise deserve single life, vndoe he be able to live without a wife. And therein also let him not provide only for the quiet and commoditie of the flesh, but that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readines and prepared to all duties of godlines. And forasmuch as this benefite is giuen to many but for a time, let evry man so long abstinence from mariage as hee shall be meete to live to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now laid upon him a necessitie to marrie. This the Apostle sheweth when he commandeth that to aoid fornication evrey man haue his owne wife, and evrey woman have her owne husband, that he that cannot lue continently should marrie in the Lord. First he declareth that the most part of men are subject to the vice of incontinentie: and that those to those that be subject vnto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth all to that oneie remedie, wherewith vnhastitie is refisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to helpe their incontinentie by this meanes, they finde euin in this that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of unhastitie, while in the meanes season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul deformes chastitie to be a cleaneffe of the minde, joyned with chastitie of the body. A woman unmarried (faith he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as he is holy both in bodie and in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commandement, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but he faith, that it is better to marrie than to bune.

44 Now married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord; they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust. For though the honestie of marriage do couter the filthines of incontinence, yet it ought not forthwith to be a provocation thereof. Wherefore let not married folkes thinke, that all things are lawfull vnto them, but let euery husband haue his owne wife soberly, and likeweise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them commit nothing vnseeming the honestie and temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord, to be restrained to measure and modestie, and not to overflow into euery kind of extreme lafciuities. This wantonnes Ambrose reproved with a saying vere fore in deede, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth the husband the adulterer of his owne wife, which in vse of wedlock hath no care of shamefaftines or honestie. Last of all, let vs consider what lawmaker doeth here condemne fornication, euën he which fith of his owne right he ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth pureneffe of the soule, spirit and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with vnceaneely gestures, and with filthie talke to laye wait to trap another's chafttie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboue measure wantonly and definitely clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchast, if we have a regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthinesse in whatsoever part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out-of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chafttie. If the Lord require chafttie of vs, then he condemneth all that ever is against it. Therefore if thou couet to shew obedience, neither let thy mind burne inwardly with cull lust, nor let thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthie talke entise thy minde to like thoughts, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blots, wherewith the pureneffe of chafttie is befouled.

The eight Commandement.

Thou shalt not steal.

45 The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, that euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The summe therefore shall be, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goodes, and that therefore we are commanded euery man to employ his faithfull traualie to preserve to euery man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke that what euery man possesseth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the Soueraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by cun means, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of thefts there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goodes of an other are by any maner of force and robbing licenciousnesse bereaved. The other kindes consisteth in malicious deciete, where they are guilefully conueied away. Another sort there is that standeth in a more hidden strate, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. Another sort in flatterie, where they are sucked away by pretence of gift. But last we should tarie too long vpon renting of all the severall kindes of theft, let vs knowe, that all craftie means whereby the possessions and money of our neighbours neighbours are conuayed vnto vs, when they once goe by crooked waiies from sincerenesse of hart, to a desire to beguile, or by any meanes to doe hurt, are to be accounted for theses. Although by pleading the lawe, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwise weigh them. For he feeth the long captious sulltlettes, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simpler minde, till at length he drawe him into his nets. He feeth the hard and vingentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppreffe and throweth downe the weaker. He feeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh thee vnware. All which things are hidden from the judgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in money, in wares, or in lands, but in evry mans right. For we defraude our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those duties which we are bound to doe for him. If any idle Factor or Baylife doe devour his matters substance, and is not heedfull to the care of his thrift, if he either doe wrongfully spoile, or doe riotously waste the substance committed vnto him, if a feruant doe mocke his matter, if hee disclofe his secrets by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe, if the Lord doe cruellly opprffe his householde, they are before God guilty of theft. For hee both witholdeth and conuuyeth another mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

46 We shall therefore rightly obey this commandement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seek to get no gaine but honest and lawful, if we couete not to waxe rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighbour of his goodes that our owne substance may encrease, if we labour not to heape vp cruell riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we doe not immeasurablely scrape together evry way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigalitie satisfied. But on the other side, let this be our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsell and helpe to keepe their owne doore as we may: but if we have to doe with false and deceitfull men, let vs rather be ready to yeeld vs some of our owne, then to strive with them. And not that onely, but let vs communicate to their necessitie, and with our store relieve their needes, whom we see fee to bee oppressed with hard and poore estate. Finally, let euery man looke how much he is by dutie bound vnto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people have in honour all those that are set over them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, till keeping God favourablie vnto them. Again, let them take care of their people, preserve common peace, defend the good, restraine the euil, and to order all things, as ready to give account of their office to the soueraigne judge. Let the ministers of Churches faithfully apply their ministrie, and not corrupt the doctrine of saluation, but declare it pure and sincere to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely by learning, but also with example of life: finallie, let them to bee over them, as good shepheardes be over the sheepe. Let the people likewise receive them for the messengers and Apostles of God, giue them that honor whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and minuter vnto them such things as are necessarie for their life.

Let parents take on them to feeke, rule and teach their children, as committted to them of God, and greeue not, nor turne away their minde from them with crueltie, but rather cherishe and imbrace them with such lenite and tendernessse, as commendeth their person. After which manner, we haue already faide, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let young men reverence olde age, even as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also governe the weaknes of youth with their wisdome and experience, wherein they excell youg men, not rating with rough and loude brawling, but tempering severitie with mildnesse and gentlenesse. Let feruants shew themselues diligent and serviceable to obey, and that not to the eie, but from the hart, as seving God himselfe. Also let masters shewe themselves not The ninth Commandment.

Thou shalt not be a lying witness against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commandment is, that because God which is truth abhorseth lying, we ought to obserue truth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall be, that we neither hurt any mans name either with flanders or false reports, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that we offend no man, by lust to speake euilly, or to be busy: with which prohibition is ioyned a commandement, that so farre as we may, we employ our faithfull enduour for euery man in affirming the truth, to defend the safcetie both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expounde the meaning of his commandement in the three and twentie Chapter of Exodus, in these wordes: Thou shalt not vse the voice of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hande to speake false witnesses for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Alfo in another place he doth not onely call vs away from lying in this point that we be no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but alfo that no man deceiue his brother, for he forbiddeth them both in seuerall commandements. Truely it is no doubt, but that as in the commandements before, he hath forbidden crueltie, vnhonestie and couetousie, fo inthis he refraineth falshood. Whereof there are two partes as we have noted before. For either we offend the good name of our neighbours by malicicouste and froward minde to backbite, or in lying and somet ime in euill speaking we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place he understood soleme and judicall testimonie, or common testimonie that is vfed in private talks. For we must alwaies hace recourse to this principle, that of all the general kinds of vices one speciall is fet for an example, whereunto the rest may be referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the faulte is most apparent. Albeit, it were convenient to extende it more generally to flanders and sinister backebtings wherewith our neighbours are wrongfullu grieved, for that falsliede of witnescing which is vfed in judicall courtes, is never vnwithout perjurie. But perjuries in somuch as they doe prophanee and defile the name of God, are alreadie sufficiently met withal in the third commandement. Wherefore the right vse of this commandement is, that our roong in affirming the truth, doe sere both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifet. For if a good name be more precious than any treasures, whatsoever they be: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoiled of the goodness of his name than of his goods. And in bereaving his substance sometime false witnesses doth as much as violence of hands.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent carelesse men doe commonly offend in this point, so that there are founde verie fewe that are not notably sickle of this disease: we are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweemeffe both in searching out and in disclosing the eues of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lye. For he that forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willeth also that it be preferred unwouched so farre as the truth will suffer. For howsooner he taketh heed to himselfe only, so that he tell no lie,

He, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keep safe our neighbours good name, that God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all evil speaking is utterly condemned. But we mean not by evil speaking, that rebuking which is vised for chastisement: nor accusation, or judiciall process, whereby remedie is sought for an evil, nor publick reprehension which tendeth to cut other sinners in fear, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behoouveth that they should be forwarned least they should be in danger by ignorance: but we mean only hateful accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnes & of a wan ton wil to backbite. All this commandement is extended to this point, that we couet not to vie a scoffing kind of pleasances, but mingled with bitter taunts, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faults under pretence of pastime, as many do that feek praise of merie conceites with other mens flame ye and grieue: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproched. Now if we bend our cies to the lawmaker, which must according to his rightfull authority be rule no lesse over the cares and mind than over the toong: truely we shall finde that greedines to heare backbitings, and a hasty readiness to eulil judgements are no lesse forbidden. For it were verie fonde if a man should think that God hateth the fault of eull speaking in the toong, and doth not disallow the fault of eull maliciousnes in the heart. Wherefore if there be in vs a true feare and love of God, let vs indeavour so far as we may and as is expedient, and as charity beacht, that we gue neither our toong, nor our cares to eull speakings, and bitter leffings, least we rashly without cause yeeld our minds to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expositions of all mens sayings, and doings, let vs both in judgement, cares, and toong gently preferre their honoures safe.

The tenth Commandement.

Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house, &c.

49. The end of this commandement is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule be wholly poyssed with the affefctyon of love: all lust is to be shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charite. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may move our minde with a concupiscence hurtful and turning toward an others losse: wherewith on the other side agreeeth the commandement, that whatsoever we conceive, purpose, will or studie vpon, be yned with the benefite and commoditie of our neighbours. But here as it seemeth, ariseth a hard and comberfome difficultie. For if it be truly saide of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are containied the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfusiously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes should afterwaarde be suetually forbidden vs. But the distinction between purpose and coueting, will easilie loose vs this knotte. For purpose (as we haue meant in speaking of it in the other commandements before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but coueting may be without any such either abusement or affent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vase and peruerse objectes. As therefore the Lorde hath heretofore commanded, that the rule of charite shoulde governe our wills, studiues, and workes: so nowe he commandeth the conceitions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and wriuen, that may provoke our minde in other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and lead into wrath, hatred, fornication, robborie, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be moued thenceunto.

50. And not without cause doth he require so great vprightneffe. For who can deme that it is righteous, that all the powers of the soule be possed with charite? But
But if any of them do swerve from the mark of charity, who can deny that it is diseased? Now whence commeth it that so many desires hurtful to thy neighbour, do enter in thy hart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest only for thy selfe? For if thy minde were altogether throughly solde with charity, no parcel thereof should be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needs be voide of charity, so farre as it receiued concupiscence. But some man will object, that yet it is not meete that fantasies that are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length doe vanish away, should be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the hart. I answer that heere our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our minde, doe together bite and strike our hart with desire, forasmuch as it never commeth in our minde, to wish for any thing, but that our hart is stirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commandeth a maruellous seruency of loute which he will not to be entangled with newer so small shares of concupiscence. He requireth a maruellously framed minde, which he suffreth not so much as with flight provocation to be any thing stirred against the law of loute. To this exposition Augustine did first open me the way: because thou shouldest not thynke that it is without consent of some graine authority. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs all wrongfull courting: yet in rehearsing that same, he hath brought forth for example those things that most commonly doe deceuie vs with a false image of delight: because he would leaue nothing to concupiscence when he dreweth it from these things, upon which it most of all rageh and triumpheth. Loe, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what wee owe to men for Gods sake, vpon consideration whereof hangeth the rule of charity. Wherefore you shall but vainely call upon those duties that are contained in this Table, vntil ye your doctrine doe stay vpon the fear and reverence of God, as vpon his foundation. As for them which seek for two commandements, in the prohibition of courting, the wife reader, though I say nothing, will judge that by wrong dilisio, they tear in tender that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against vs, that this word, I thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after that hee had first set the house, then hee renteth the parts thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrews do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, & that God in effect commandeth, that all that every man posseth, should remaine safe and untouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraud them, but also from the very least desire that may move our minds.

But now to the end the whole law tendeth, it shall not bee hard to judge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteounesse, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deeds, that which is there commanded, he shal in a manner express an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses vnto the sum thereof into the minde of the Israelites, he said: And now Israel, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, & walke in his wares? loe him and serve him in all thy hart, and in all thy soule, & keep his commandements? And he ceased not still to sing the same song against them, to oft as he purposed to shew the end of the law. The doctrine of the lawe hath such respect herunto, that it remaineth man, or as Moses in another place termed thereof, maketh man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Now the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the two principall points already rehearsed. That wee loe the Lord God with all our hart, all our soule, and all our strength, and our neighbours as our selves. And the first indede is, that our soule be in all parts filled with the loue of God. From that by and by of it selfe sooth floweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sweareth when he wrieth, that the end of the law is loue out of a pure confidence, and a faith not fained. You fee how, as it were, in the head is set conscience and faith unavained, that is to say in one word true godlines, and that from thence is charity derived. Therefore he is deceived, who foure thinketh that in the law are taught only certain rudiments and first introductions of righteousness, where with men became to be taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true marks of good works: whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paul, you can desire nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For how far I pray you, will he proceede that will not be contented with this institution, whereby man is instructed to the fear of God, to spiritualy worshipping, to obeying of the commandments, to follow the uprightness of the way of the Lord: finally to purenes of conscience, sincere faith and love? Whereby is confirmed that expiotion of the law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandments thereof all the duties of godliness and love. For they that follow only the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods will, know not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52 But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the law, Christ and the Apostle doe sometime leaue out the first Table: many are deceived therein while they would faine draw their wordes to both the Tables. Christ in Mathew calleth the chief points of the law, mercy, judgement, and faith: under the word Faith, it is not doubtful to me, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulness toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole Law, take it for religiouslye toward God. But they labor in vaine. For Christ speakes of those worke which man ought to prooue himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also caule to maruell why, when a young man asked him what be the commandments by keeping whereof we enter into life: he answered these things onely: Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not stule. Thou shalt beare no false wittnes. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbor as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection of the hart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the hart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continuallie vfe. But the worke of charitie are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousness. But this commeth eche where so of in the Prophets, that it must needs be familiar to a reader, but meanelie exercised in them. For in a manner alwaye, when they exhorte to repentance, they leaue out the first Table, and onely call upon Faith, Judgement, Mercy, and Equitie. And thus they doe not overskip the feare of God, but they enquire the earnest proue thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowne, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they doe for the most part rest upon the second Table, because therein the study of righteousnes and uprightness is most openly scene. It is needfull to rehearse the places, because every man will of himselfe easily marke that which I say.

53 But thou wilt say, is it then more aishable to the perfection of righteousness, to live innocently among men, than with true godliness to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easilly kepe charitie in all pointes, vaine he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby proued, that he hath godliness also. Behide that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefite can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifye by the Prophet: therefore he requireth not our dutties to himselfe, but doth exercise vs in good worke toward our neighbor. Therefore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charitie. And not inconveniencly in another place he calleth the same the fulfilling of the law: adding that he hath performed the law that loueth his neighbour. Againe, That all the law is comprehended in one word, Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For he teacheth no one thing, but the same whiche Christ doth when he saith: Whatsoever ye will that men do to you, doe ye the same to them. For this is the law and the Prophets. It is certaine that in the law and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the

Rom 13.

the true worship of God, holdeth the principal place, and that Love is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the Law is only prescribed vs to an observation of right and equity, wherein we be exercised to testify our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Here therefore let us sticke fast, that then our life shall be best framed to Gods will and the rule of his Law, when it shall be every way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole Law there is not read one syllable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as he shall doe or leave undone to the commodity of his owne fleth. And surely fifh men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they be too much carried all headlong to the louse of themselves, and howe much sooner they fall from the truth yet still they keepe that selfe louse, there needed no law any more to enflame that louse, that was naturally of itselfe, too much beyond measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the louse of our felues, but the louse of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the Commandements, and that he liueth best and most holily, that (so neere as may be) liueth and travelleth leaft for himselfe, and that no man liueth worfe and more wickedly than he that liueth and travelleth for himselfe and onely thinketh upon and seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with howe great earnestness we ought to be led to the louse of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the louse of our felues as by a rule, because he had no other vehemente or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner of speaking is diligently to be wedyed. For he doth not, as certaine Sophisters have foolishly dreamed, give the first degree to the louse of our felues, and the second to charitie, but rather that affection of louse which we doe all naturally draw to our felues, he giueth away vnto other, whereupon the Apostle faith, that Charitie seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to be esteemed worth a haire that the thing ruled is ever inferior to his Rule. For God doth not make the louse of our felues, a rule whereunto charitie toward other should be subject, but whereas by pertuerf方面 of nature, the affection of louse was wont to rest in our felues, he sheweth that now it ought to be elsewhere spread abroad, that we should with no leffe cheerfulnes, fruencies, and carufelines beready to doe good to our neighbour than to our felues.

55 Now fith Christ hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour every man is contained be he neuer fo strange vnto vs: there is no caufe why we should restraine the commandement of louse within the bounds of our owne friendships and acquainances. I deny not that the neere that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our iudgements to doe him good. For in the order of humanitie requireth, that so many moe duties of frienden men should communicate together, as they be bound together with stronger bonds of kinred, familiaritie or neighbour hoode, and that without any offence of God, by whose prudence we are in a manner driven thenceunto. But I say that all mankinde without exception is to be imbraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God and not in themselues: from which consideration when we turne away, it is no maruell if we be entangled with many errors. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of lousing, we must not turne our eyes vnto man, the sight of whom would oft enforse vs to hate them to louse, but vnto God which commandeth that the louse which we offer him, be powered abroad among all men: that this be a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoever the man be, yet he ought to be loused because God is loused.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoole- men of these commandements, touching not defiring of revengement, and lousing Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of our enemies, which in the old time both were given to the Jews and at the same time were commonly given to all Christians, have made Counsels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they have posted out to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keep the Counsels. And they render a reason why they receive them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdenous and heauie, specially for Christians that are under the law of grace. So dare they presume to repel the eternall law of God touching the loving of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in anie lease of the law? and are not therein the rather each where found commandements that doe most severely require of vs to love our enemies? For what manner of lying is that, where we are commanded to feeder our enemies when he is hungrie: to let into the right waiue his Oxen or Asses straying out of the way, or to caste them when they faint under their burden? Shall we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good will to himseld? What is not the word of the Lord everlafting? Leave vengeance to me, and I will requite it. Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place. Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindfull of the inury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not willingly faile that he was a counsel giber.

57 And what I praise you meane these things that they haue presumed to mooke withall in their vnfauorie glose? Loue your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, bleue them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven. Who cannot have reason with Chrystiane, that by so necessary a cause it plainly appeareth they are no exhortations but commandements? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monkes shall be the children of the heauenlie father, they only shall be bold to call upon God their Father: what shall the Church do in the meane season? it shall by like right be sent alway to the Gentiles and Publicans. For Christ faith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what favour looke ye for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left unto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen taken away from vs. And no lefse strong is Augustines argument. When (faith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lefse forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemie than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giveth leave to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enemie. But these two, not to steale, and not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compass of the rule of love, ye and teacheth that they are contained under this commandement. Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expiror of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loved, even by commandement, like as our friends. Therefore they doe truly bewray themselves to be the children of Satan, that do licentiously shake off the common yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they have published this doctrine with more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of the olde writers that do not pronounce as of a thing certain, that these are meane commandements. And that euin in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without contrary take them for commandements. And how foolish do they reason? They say that they are too weightie a burden for Christians. As though there could be devised any thing more weightie than to love God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strengthe. In comparison of this law any thing may be counted easie, whether it be to love our enemies, or to lay away all desire of reuenge out of our mind. In deede all things are high and hard to our weaknes even the least title of the law. It is the Lord Lord in whom we set our strength. Let him give what he commandeth, and command what he will. Christian men to be under the law of grace, is not unbridledly to wander without law, but to be grafted in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the Law, and by whose spirit they have a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul improperly called a law, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men doe in the name of the law, dispute upon a matter of nothing.

Of like sort it is that they called Venial sinne, both secret vngodliness that is against the first Table, and also the direct transgressing of the last Commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without adulterous affent, which refleth not long in the hart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the hart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We forbid to have strange gods. When the minde is taken with the engines of distrut, looketh about elsewhere, when it is touched with a sodaine desire to remove the blessed in some other way; whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule empty to receive such temptations? And to the end not to draw out this argument to greater length, there is a commandement given to love God with all our hart, with all our minde, with all our soule: 'If then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the loue of God, we have already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdom, and interrupt his decree, doe proue that God hath not his throne well established in our conscience.' As for the last commandement, we have already shewed that it properly belongeth hereto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? We are already guilty of coueting, & therewithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lord doth forbid vs, not only to purpose and practice any thing that may be to another's loss, but also to be pricked and sweeld with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang over the transgression of the law. We cannot therefore proue even the very least desires free from judgement of death. In weyng of sinnes (faith Aug: Finne) let vs not bring false balances to weigh what we lift and how we lift at our owne pleasure, sayyng: this is heavy and this is light; but let vs bring God's balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lords treasurie, and let vs therein weigh what is heauie; rather let vs not wey, but reknowledge things already weighed by the Lord. But what faith the Scripture? Truely when Paul faith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew ned this shinking distinction. Sith we are too much inclined to hypocrisie, this cherishment thereof ought not to have beene added to flatter our flotshfull consciences.

I would to God they would consider what that saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so, shall be counted none in the kingdom of Heauen. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the law, as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to have considered, not only what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authority is diminished in every transgression, how little soever it be, of the law that he hath given in commandement. Is it a small matter with them, that Gods maieftie be offended in anything? Morouer if God hath declared his will in the law, whatsoever is contrary to the law, displeaseth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not goe forth with follow upon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their harts to heare his voice, than to trouble cleare truth with their vnauxourie subtitles of argument. The foule (is thy) that shanteth, the same shall die. Againe, which I even now alleaged, the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they graunt it to be a sinne, because they cannot deny it, yet they stand stiffe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But fis they have hitherto too much borne with their owne madness, let them yet at length learne to wafe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of God, which of necessitie proouketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the law, upon which the judgment of God is pronounced without exception: and that the sins of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercie of God.

The ix. Chapter.

That Christ although he was known to the Jews under the law, yet was delivered onely by the Gospell.

Because it pleased God in the old time not vainely by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vain did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: even then without doubt he was known in the same image, wherein he now appeareth to vs with full brightness. Therefore Malachi, after that he had hid the Jews to take heed to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in studie thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets,) did foorthwith declare, that there should arise a sonne of righteousnesse. In which words he teacheth, that the Lawe assigneth to this purpose, to hold the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deed. For this reason doth Peter lay, that the Prophets did make search, and diligently enquire, of the salvation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was revealed vnto them, that they should minifie, not to themselves, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was unprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing attainted themselves: but because they enjoyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eies. And wheras they did but a little sip of it, there is offered vnto vs a more plentiful enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witnesse borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Jews. For speaking to the Disciples, he saith: Blessed are the eies that see that which ye see, and blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many kings and Prophets have wished it, and haue not obtained it. This is no small commendation of the revealing of the Gospell that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place disagree not, where it is said, that Abraham lave the day of Christ, and reioyced. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, yet he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that joy which accompanied the holy Prophet, even to his death. And that saying of John Baptist: No man hath seene God at any time, the onely begotten that is in the bosome of the father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had bin dead before him, from the fellowhip of the understanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ: But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that tho mysterie, which they sawe but darkely under shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews doth well set out, saying, that God diuerely and manie wises spake in olde time by the Prophets, but now by his beloved Sonne, although therefore that onely begotten one, which is at this day to vs the brightnesse of the glorie, and the print of the substance of God the father, was in olde time known to the Jews, as we haue in another place alleged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the olde deliuernce: yet is it true, which the same Paul else where teacheth, that God which commanded the light to shine out of darke, hath now shined. upon our harts to set forth the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Iesus Chrift: because when he appeared in this his image, he did in a manner make him selfe visible, in comparison of the darke and hidowith forme that had beene of him before. And so much the more flight and despicable in their unhankfulness and per-uersenesse, that are here so blinde at mid day. And therefore Paul faith, that their mindes are darkened by Satan, that they should not see the glory of Chrift shining in the Gospell, though there be no velle fet between them and it.

2. Nowe I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the mysterie of Chrift. I grant truly, that in respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the law, concerning the free for- At. 8. giveness of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts there- of. For he compareth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be fought by works. Whereupon folo- weth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained under it all the testimonies that God in old time gave to the fathers, of his mercy & fatherlie favor: But in the more excellent signification of it, I saie it is applied to the publifhing of the grace given in Chrift. And that meaning is not onely received by common- vs, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Chrift and the Apostles. Where- upon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospell of the king- dome. And Mark maketh his preface in this manner, The beginning of the Gospell of Iesus Chrift. And there is no neede to gather places to prove a thing sufficiently known. Chrift therefore by his comming hath made cleere the life and immortality by the Gospell. By which words Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogative of honour to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kind of message, whereby God perfometh those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the sonne. For although the faithfull haue alwayes found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Chrift are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their harts: yet because he hath accomplished all parts of our saluation in his flehe, therefore that selfe liuely deliueringe of the things rightfully obtained a newe and singular title of præfa. Whereupon commeth that saying of Chrift: Hereafter yee shall see the heauen open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending vpon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vi- sion to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie thereof may stand familiare open to all men.

3. But yet we must take heed of the diueller imagination of Servetus, which when he goeth about, or at least faith that he goeth about, to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Chrift, ytterly abolisht the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference between vs and Chrift. I did in deed even now declare that Chrift left nothing unperformed of the whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe alreadie enjoy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were fæler, that our salvation is hid in hope. I grantindeede, that we be beleuving in Chrift, doe alfo passe from death to life: But in the meanes seauen wee must hold this saying of John, that although we knowe we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shall be like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Chrift offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enjoying thereof lieth still hid vnder the keeping of hope, till being vncovered of the corruptible flehe, we be transfigured into the glory of...

of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holy Ghost biddeth vs to rest upon the promises, whose authority outh with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthy dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godliness hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason hee boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that we have the same promises, which in the old time were given to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spirit of promise, but yet we doe no otherwise enjoy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he indeed dwelleth in our harts, and yet we wander in iourney abroad from him: because we walke by faith and not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together: that we posseffe in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seen. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing which the lawe did shadow vnder figures.

4. And hereby also is their error convinced, which doe neuer otherwise compare the lawe with the Gospell, but as they compare the merites of works with the free imputation of rightoufheffe. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be rejectt: because Paul doth oftentimes understande by the name of the lawe, a rule to live righteously, wherein God requireth of vs, that which is his, not giving vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do never so little unlike from it: that is in such places as he diuerteth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous: because the obseruation of the lawe, whereunto the reward is promised, is nowhere founde. Therefore Paul doth fely make the righteouseties of the lawe and of the Gospell, contrarie the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succeede in place of the whole lawe, that it shoulde bring any diverser meanes of saluation, but rather to confirm and prooue to be of force, whatsoever the lawe had promised, & to ioyne the bodye to the shadowes. For when Christ faith, that the law and the Prophets were vntill John: he maketh not the fathers subjicet to the curse, which the bond-servants of the lawe can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so as they flaied a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paul calling the Gospell the power of God, to saluation to every belieuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witnesse of the lawe and the prophets. But in the ende of the same Epistle, although he shew that the title of praisefor Jesus Christ is the reclamacion of the mystery, kept secret in the euenerlasting times: yet hee doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that hee is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to entreat of the whole lawe, the Gospell differeth from the lawe only in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath beene laide open for vs in Christ, it is now not without cause saide, that at his comming the heauenly kingdom of God was erected in earth.

Rom. 1. 6.

The preaching of John a meanes betweene the lawe & the Gospell. In which vspect his office differeth both from the proffets and Apostles hee seemed greater than the one and lesse than the other.

4. Now betwene the lawe and the Gospell came John, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though he called Christ the lamb of God, and the facrifice for the cleance of sinnes, he showed forth the summe of the Gospell: yet because he did not expresse that same incomparable strength and glorie, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ faith, that he was not equall to the Apostles. Forso do those words of his meane: that though John excelled among the fonnes of women, yet hee that is leaft in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred John before the Prophets, he aduanceth the preaching of the Gospell.
God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 110

Gospel to the highest degree: which preaching we see in another place signified by the kingdom of heaven. But whereas John himself doth anwser that he is but a voice, as though he were inferior to the Prophets, he doth not that for sain’d humilities sake, but meaneth to teach that the proper office of the Embassadors was not committed to him; but that he only executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachi: Behold, I send Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministrie, but endeavours to get disciples to Christ: as also Esay prooueth, that this was enioyed him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candle burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but that he may be reckoned among the publisers of the Gospel, like as he used the fame Baptisme, which was afterward delivcred to the Apostles. But that which he began, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heavenly Glory.

The 1. Chapter.

Of the likeenesse of the old and new Testament.

By the things aforesaid it may now appeare evidently, that all the men whom from the beginning of the world God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which now remaineth in force among vs, bound in covenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adoinc vnto it for an addition, that the fathers were partners of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one salvation by the grace of one Mediator, how farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we have gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for proof of thereof, doe make it plainely that there was never any other rule of religion and godliness in the people of God; yet because in writers there are oftentimes many things spoken of the difference of the old and new Testament, that may make the Reader that is not of verie sharpe judgement to bee in doubt: therefore we shall rightfullie appoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter: Yea, and that thing also, which other wise should have beene verie profitable for vs, is now made necessarie by that monstous lofell Sermestus and by ducers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptists, which have no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondly faine to have beene fatted vp by the Lord here in this earth, without anie hope of heavenly immortality. Therefore that we may kepe away this pestilential error from godly minds, and also to pluckle out of them all doutes which are wont by and by to arise vpon hearing mention of the ducers fite betwene the olde and the new Testament: let vs by the wy人家 looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what covenant the Lordes made with the Israelites in the olde time before the coming of Christ, and what covenant he hath now made with vs since Christ hath beene openly shewen.

2 And both these points may be made plaine with one worde. The covenant of all the fathers so differeth nothing from ours, in substance and in matter it self, that it is altogether one and the selfe same: but the ministriation is divers. But because of so great shortenesse no man were able to attaine to certaine understanding, we must needs proceed on with a longer declaration if we meant to profite any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shall be sufficient to discourse againe of new vpon all the speciall particulars that haue already bee declared: and it shall be out of season to mingle those things together, that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest vpon three principall points:

A thing necessary to know the agreement & difference between our scriptures and the fathers under the law.

Fifth

First, that we hold, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the mark appointed to the Iewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosen vnto the hope of immortalitie; and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the couenant whereby they were tyed to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the onely mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the Mediator, by whom they should both be tyed to God and enjoy his promises. Of which points, because the seconde peradventure is not yet sufficiently known, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many and cleere testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodnesse and tender favour, whatsoever good the Lord at any time did, and promis to the people of Israel. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declaration of it, and we have not left the first altogether untouched.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most controverse about it, we wil employ the more earnest trauell: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in convenient place be added. Truely, the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospell, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the rightouenesse of faith which is taught by the Gospell itselfe, hath witnesse of the lawe and the Prophets. For the Gospell doth not holde the harts of men in the joy of this present life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not fasten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope laide vp in heaven, doth in a manner transport them eitheer. For thus he defines in another place. Since that ye beleued the Gospell, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earneft of our inheritance, for the redemption of the poſſeflion purchased. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesu, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes fake that is laid vp for you in heauen, whereof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospell. Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospell to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called both the word of saluation, and the power of God to safe the faithfull, and the kingdome of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Gospell be spirituell, and openeth the entire to the poſſeflion of an incorruptible life: let vs not thynke that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe over and neglect the care of their soule, and live duly like beasts in seeking pleasures of the bodie. Neither let any man here caull that the promisses which are sealed in the lawe and the Prophets, concerning the Gospell, were ordained for the new people. For within a little after, that which he spake of the Gospell promised in the lawe, he addeth, that all the things that the lawe containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are under the lawe. I graunt in deed it is in another argument. But he was not so forgetfull, as he had once faide that all the things which the lawe containeth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a few verses before he had affirmed of the Gospell promised in the lawe. Therefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the olde Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he faith, that vnder it are contained the promisses of the Gospell.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stoode vpon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meanes of Christ. For the vorie preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are justisfied by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne defertuing, and the whole fame thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whom we heare that the couenant of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation? Who dare make them strangers from the benefite of free saluation, to whom whom we hear that the doctrine of the righteousness of faith was minified. But, that we dispute not long of an evident matter, we have a notable sentence of the Lord, Abraham rejoiced that he might see my day, he saw it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle testifieth that it was vniuerfall in the faithfull people, when he faith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for euer. For he speaketh not there onely of the eternal Godhead of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed virgine and Zacharie in their songs, do say, that the salvation revealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in old time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lord in giving his Christ, discharged his old oath, it cannot be faide but that the end thereof was alway in Christ an everlafting life.

5 Yea, and the Apostle doth make the Israelites equall with vs, not onely in the grace of the covenant, but also in signification of sacraments. For meaning by examples of punishments, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they should not runne into the like offences, he beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why we should challenge any prerogative vnto our selves, to deliver vs from the vengeance of God which they suffetteth, forasmuch as the Lord did not onely grant vnto them the same benefits, but he hath gloriously sett forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if he should have faide: If ye thee trust that ye be out of perill, because both Baptisme wherewith ye are markt, and the Supper which yee daily receiue, have excellent promises, and in the meanes time despising the goodness of God, yee are licentiously wanting: Know ye, that the Jews also were not without such sacraments, against whom yet the Lord did most feuerely put his judgement in execution. They were Baptised in passing over the sea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the Sunne. They sate, that that same passeage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spiritual Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meanceth heere to have this taken away from the Christians, that they thinke that they excell the Jews by the prerogative of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subject to this cullation: that they did eate the same spiritual meate that we eate, and drinke the same spiritual drinke, which hee expoundeth to be Christ.

6 To overthrow this sentence of Paul, they object that which Christ faith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wildernesse, and are dead: see that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer. Which two places are very easely made to agree together. The Lord, because he then talked to hearers that were onely to be filled with food of their bellies, but care not for the meate of the soule, tempered his talk somewhat to their capacitie, but especially he frameith the companion of Manna and of his bodie according to their taste. They required that he, to get himselfe some credite, would approveth his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the Wildernesse, when he obtained Manna from heauen. But in Manna they conceived nothing but the remede of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they praised not to that higher mysterie which Paul hath respect unto Christ therefore, to shew how much greater a benefit they ought to looke for at his hands, than that which they reported that Moses did blesse upon their fathers, frameith this comparison: If it were a great myracle in your opinion, and worthie to be remembred, that the Lord by Moses minified food from heauen to his people, to sustaine them for a small time, that they should not perish for hunger in the wildernesse: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meate that giveth immortalitie. We see why the Lorde passed out that thing which was principal in Manna, and spake only.

The words of Christ in saying: Your fathers did eate Manna and are dead: see that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer.

For they were whom Christ spake the same Spirituall meate that we eate.
The form of the covenant of God with the fathers, promising to be their God, proved what eternal life was promised them.

The fathers were enlightened and coupled unto God by the seed of that word which is immortal, so that they had the benefit of immortal life and eternal life.

The knowledge of only of the baddest profitee of it: even because the Iewes as it were of purpose to reprocum him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessity of the people with remedy of Manna: hee answered that he is the minister of a much higher grace, in comparison whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they do much esteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because hee knew that the Lord when he rayned Manna from heauen, did not only powre it downe for the feeding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that part that was most woorthie of consideratioll. Wherefore it certeiny and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heavenly life, which now the Lorde vouchsafeth to grant vnto vs, were not only communicated vnto the Iewes, but also sealed with very spirituall Sacraments. Of which matter Augustine dispuette largely against Fanaticus the Manichee.

7 But if the readers had rather to have testimonies alleaged vnto them out of the lawe and the Prophets, whereby they may perceiue that the spirituall covenant was common all to the fathers, as we heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also followe that desire, and to much the more willingly, because by that meanes the adueraries shall be more surely convinced, so that they shall have afterward no way to dally. And I will begin at that proffee, which although I knowe that the Anabaptists pride will thinke very fonde and in a manner to be laughed at, yet shall much amaze with such readers as are willing to leame and have their sound wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the worde of God, that whome so euer God vouchsafeth to bee partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For the saying of Peter hath alwaye bene of force, that it is the incorruptible seede which abideth for euer, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Nowe fith God in the old time bounde the Iewes vnto him with this holy bonde, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they imbraced the worde, which should joine them nigher to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it: not that generall manner, which is powred abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the worlde, which although it doe quicken all things, eueri one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliver them from necessity of corruption: but I speake of this speciall manner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a manner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, fith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaued vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortall kingdom of God. For it was a sound partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefit of eternall life.

8 But if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the very forme of the covenant, which shall not onely fatische sober wits, but also shall sufficiently convince their ignorance that tend themselues to speake against it. For God did alwaies thus covenant with his servants: I will be to you a God, and ye shalbe to me a people. In which worde the Prophets themselves are woont to expound, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of bleffednesse is comprehended. For Davids doth not without cause often pronounce, that bleffed is the people, whose God is the Lord: bleffed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicitiees fake, but because he delivereth them from death, hee preserueth them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternall mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophets, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lord is our king, our lawmaker, he shall saue vs. Bleffed art thou, O Israel, because thou art saued in the Lorde God. But, not to labour out much in a thing needlesse, this admonition is founde each where in the Prophets, that wee shall want nothing towarde all aboundance of good things, and assuranc of saluation, For I now represent, the benefit of the mercies of God, although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spiritual life plain enough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God unto their bodies alone, but principally to their souls. But souls vaneless, they should be rejoyced by righteousnesse remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let this rejoyning be present, it shall bring everlasting salvation with it.

9 Before that, he did not onely testify that he was to them their God, but also promised that he would be so alway, to the end that their hope not contented with present benefites, should be extended to eternity. And many sayings do shew, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as their faithfull not only in present evils, but also for the time to come, do comfort themselves with this, that God will never fail them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly affur'd them of the blessing of God to be prolonged unto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seed after you. For if he minded to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their posterity, much more would his favour not fail toward themselves. For God is not like unto men, which do therefore care their love to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so that they cannot employ their friendly doings upon them to whom they did beare good will. But God, whose boundless is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the verie dead the fruit of the mercie, which for their sakes he poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable proofe to set forth unto them the greatness & flowing plentie of his goodnes, which they should feel after death, when he decribed it to be such as should flowe over into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then seal, and as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, long after their death. For what had it not bin a fond naming, if they had utterly perished? For then had it bin all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Evangelists hereafter, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driven to a strait, that they could not deny that Moses did testify the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the judge of life and death had receiv'd into his safeguard, custodie, and protection.

10 Nowe (which is the principall point whereupon this controversie hanger) let vs looke, whether the faithfull themselves have not bene so instru'd of the Lord, that they perceived that they should have a better life elswhere, and to neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enjoyned them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happiness were only in this life. Adam, most unhappy, even with only remembrance of the happiness that he had lost, did with painfull labors hardly sustaine his neediness, and that he should not be presst with the curse of God, in the only labours of his hands, even there receiv'd he extreme sorrow of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sons, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left alone, whose sight he worthily detected and abhorred. Abel cruelly murdered in the verie flower of his age, became an example of the wretches of men. Nor while the whole world carelesly lived in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great

Gen. 6.22. great weariness in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to pass by his greater troubles, than if he should have dyed an hundred deaths. For besides that the Arke was to him as a grave for tenne moneths, there is nothing more unpleasant than to be holden so long in maner drowned in dung of beasts. When he had passed over so great difficulties, he fell into new matter of griefe, he saw himselfe scornd of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefite of God he had received safe from the generall flood.

Gen. 9.24. None more miserable than Abraham, if his condition in this life only be reflected.

Gen. 12.4. Abraham in deed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if we consider his faith, which is set forth vnto vs for the best rule of believing, of whose kinred we must be accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to posseffe so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be thrown downe out of the number, no not from the most honourable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Now as touching the experiences of his life: when he was first called by the commandement of God, he was plucked away from his country, his parents and his friends, in whom men think to be the chief sweeteeneffe of life: even as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoyle him of all the pleasures of life. So soon as he came into the land where he was commanded to dwell, he was driven out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to saue himselfe, he was compelled to deliver out his wife to be abused, which we know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the land of his owne dwelling, he was driven out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that land, wherein a man must so oft be hungry, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewithall he was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that he must needes redeeme his life with the loss of his wife, while manie yeres long he wandred uncertainly hither and thither, he was compelled by the continual brawlings of his servants to put away his nephewe, whom he lovd as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt he did no other wise take than if he had suffered the cutting off of one of his limmes. A little after, he heard that he was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whither sooner he went, he found neighbours outrageously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the wells that himselfe had digged with great labour. For he would not have redeemed the vfe of them at the hand of King Gerar, if he had not first beene forbidden. Now when he came to old age, he saue the thing which is the most unpleasant and bitter that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismael, whose birth yet he paid dearer, when he was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if he in maintaining the shubberneeffe of his bondswoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his householde. At length Israe was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismael must, as forlorn, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Israel was left, in whom the wearied age of the silent good man might rest, within a little after he was commanded to kill him. What can mans wit devise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Israell had died of any sickeneffe, who would not have thought the old man most miserable, that had a sonne given him in moccage, for whom his griefe of want of children should be doubted? If he had beene slaine by some stranger, the vnhappyneffe of the thing would have much encreased his miserie. But this passeth all examples of miserie, to have him slaine with his fathers owne hands. Finally, he was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man object that he was not altogether vnhappy, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempesst. For
For we cannot say that he liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully wearth out of infinit troubles, but him that without feeling of evils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

Isaac that was lefte troubled with euils, yet scarce euer tooke any taste of sweetnesse. He also felt the fame vexations, that do not suffer a man to be bleffed in the earth. Famine chafed him out of the land of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all means oppressed him, so that he was faine to flirue for his water: at home in his owne house, he suffed much troublefomneffe by his childrens wuiues, he was grieved with disagreemens of his sons, and could not remembe that fo great a mischiefe, but by the banishment of him whom he had bleffed. But as for Iacob, he is nothing elfe but a notable example of extreme infelicitie. He paffed his childhood moft vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to give place. When hee was fledde from his parents and his native countrie, beseide that it was a greuous thing to live in baniishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently receiued of his uncle Laban. Then it suffeced not that hee had servd feven yeere a harde and cruell service, but that also muft bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wuiue fake he was driuen into newe service, where he was all the day fried with heathe of the funne, and all the night lay waking and pained with frost & cold, as himselfe complayned. While he by the space of twenteie yeeres suffed fo harde a life, he was daily vexed with new injuries of his father in lawe. Neither was he quiet in his owne house, seeing it divided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enui of his wuiues. When he was commanded to returne into his coutrie, he was compelled to watch an advantage to take his journey, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could he not to escape the vnuitf dealing of his Father in lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his journey. Then fell he into a much more cruell daffafle. For when hee came neere to his brother, he had fo manie deatthes before his eies, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemie. So was hee more measure tormented and as it were drawn infunder with terrible fearhes, so long as he looked for his brothers comming, when he came once in his sight, he fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, until he found him more fauourable than hee durft haue hoped. Beseide that, at his first entrie into the lande, he lost Rachel his deereely beloved wife. Afterward he heard wordes that the fonne which he had by her, and whom therefore hee looued above the rest, was torn with Wilde beastes: by whose death how great grieues he conceiued, he himselfe declared in this that after long weeping he obstinately flopped vp all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leaving himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his fonne walting into the grave. In the meanes time how great caufes of grieues, waiting and weaiines were the rauiement and deflouing of his daughter, and the boldneffe of his fons in renewing it, which not only made him to bee abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that coutrie, but also procured him most preuent peril of vnder destruction? Then followed that horrible outrageous offence of Ruben his first begotten fonne, which was such as there could not chance a more greious. For whereas the defiling of a mans wifes is reckoned among the highestill fortures: what is to bee faide of it, when that wickedneffe is committed by a mans owne fonne? Within a little whilte after, his house is spotted with another unnaturall adulterie: so that fo manie flames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Necre before the ende of this life, while he sought to prouide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tidings of a new misfortune, understanding that another of his fons was kept in prifon, for recounting of whom hee was compelled to leaue to the rest Benedict his only darling. Who can thinke, that in such a heape of mischiefs he had any one moment giuen him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the three writes of himselfe, affirmed to Pharaoh, that his daies were short and euer upon the earth. Now truly he that declarath that he hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperity which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Jacob did vнакindly and vthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truely pro\r\n\r\nselfed that he had beene miserable upon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened upon earthly things.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as undoubted they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, treuly they both thought and faw it to be another manner of ble\r\nselfe, than the blessedneffe of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doth shew exceedingly well: Abraham (faith he) direct by faith in the lande of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with Isaac and Jacob partners with him of the fame inheritance, for they looked for a citie set vpon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promised, but looking at them a farre off, and beleauing and confessing that they were guests & strangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare that they sought for a coun\r\ntrie, and if they had been moued with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they sought for a better, that is the heavenly coun\r\ntrie. Wherefore God is not athamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had beene duller than blockes, to follow promises so earnestlie, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vnlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them elswhere. But this he chiefly inforcteth, & that not without good reason, that they called this life a journey from home; even as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers and forciners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lords promise, whereby they were made heirs of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lords promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for burial, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receive the fruit of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Jacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his son Joseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it; and why Joseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be removed thither.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the trauails of this life they had al\r\nway set before them the blessedneffe of the life to come. For to what purpose should Jacob have so much desired, and with so great danger fought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the words which he spake among his last breathings. Lord, I will looke for thy saluation. What salvation could he have looked for, when he saie that he lay readie to give vp the Ghost, vnles he had seen in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispuite we of the holy ones and children of God, when euon he was not without a taste of such understanding, which otherwise was enimie to the truth? For what meaneth Balaam when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like unto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that David afterward vterted, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is verie euil: If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference between the righteous and unrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diercisse of the eftates that after death shall befall to them both.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitfulneffe of the ground.
ground and plente of all things. And yet (ynlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth itselfe) there is alreadie a plaine declaration of the spiritual covenant. But if we come downe to the prophets, there with most ful brightnesse both the life everlasting and the kingdom of Christ do utter themselves. And first of all David, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of God's distribution, he shewed the heavenly mysteries in shadows more darkly than the rest, yet with what plainnes and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? Howe he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forreiner and stranger, as all my fathers were. Euerie living man is vanity, every one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord?uen to thee is my hope. Truly he that confesseth that in the earth there is nothing found or stedfast, keepeth full a stedfastnes of hope in God, considereth his felicity laid vp in another place. To such consider-ation is he wont to call all the faithful, so oft as he meanteth to comfort them truly. For in another place after he had spoken of the shortenes, and the transtite and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: But the mercie of the Lord is for ever upon them that feare him. Like wherunto is that which is in the hundred and secondo Psalm. At the Beginning Lorde thou didn't lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the workes of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe old like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remaine the selfe fame, and thy yeres shall not faile: the fones of thy seruants shall dwell, and thy posteritie shall be established before thee. If the godlie cease not for the decarie of heaven and earth to be stablished before the Lorde, it followeth that their salvation is joyned with the eternitie of God. But that hope cannot stand at all, vnes it rest upon the promisse that is set forth in Efaie: The heavens (faith the Lord) shall vanishe away like smoke, the earth shall be worn out like a garment, and the inhabitants of it shall perish like those things: But my salvation shall bee for euer, and my righteousnesse shall not faile: where everlastingeffe is gien to righteousnes and salvation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither may we otherwise take those things, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous success of the faithfull, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heavenly glorie. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliver them from the hand of the sinne. Light is arsten to the righteous, and joy to the pright in hart. The righteousnes of the godly man abideth for euer: his hornes shall be exalted in glorie, the desire of the sinne shall perish. Againe: but the righteous shall confesse unto thy name, the pright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous shall bee in eternall remembrance: Againe: the Lord shall redeeme the soules of his seruants. For the Lord oftentimes leaueth his seruants to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to bee torine in peeces and destroyed: he suffereth the good to lie languishing in darkenes and filth, while the wicked doe in a manner shone among the farrers. And hee doth not so cheere them with the brightnesse of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladnes. Wherefore even he also hideth not, that if the faithfull fatten their eyes vpon the present state of things, they shall be striken with a sore temptation, as though there were no favoure or reward of innocencie with God. So much doth wickednesse for the most part prosper and flourisht, while the companie of the godlie is oppressed with flame, povertrie, contempt, and all kindes of croffes. It wanteth but little (faith he) that my foorle slipped not, and my steps fell not abroad, while the fortune of soules grieueth me, and while I see the prosperitie of the wicked. At length after rehearsall of it he concludes: I bent my thought, if I could understand these things. But it is a torment to my spirit, till I enter into the sanctuarie of the Lord, and understand the last end of them.

The foolish could not have comforted themselves, as both David and Samuel did with the momentaneous shortenes of their stroes.

17. Let vs therefore learne yet by this confession of David, that the holy fathers vnder the olde testament were not ignorant, how seldom or nouer God doth in this world performe to his servants those things that he promiseth them, and that therefore they did lift vp their minds to Gods favoures, wherein they had that laide vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last judgement of God, which when they could not see with eyes, they were content to understand by Faith. Trusting vpvn which allience, whatsoever happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings doe witnesse, I will behold the face of God in righeteoufnes: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Again : I as a greene Olue tree in the house of the Lord. Again: The righteous shall flourish as a date tree, & thall spread in branches like the Cedar of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They shall flall beare fatre, they shalbe fat and greene in their old age. When he had said a little before: How deepe are thy thoughts? O Lord, while the wicked doe flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perift for euer. Where is that faire thou and beautie of the faithfull, but when the face of this world shall be turned inward by disclofrog the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternitie, they despised the hardnes enduring but a moment of present miseries, and boldly burst forth into these wordes: Thou shalt not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw downe the wicked headlong into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternall destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicitie, this is also reckened in another place, that they close vp the end of their life in a moment without long languishing. Where is that so greatdedauffette of the holy ones, whom David himselfe elsewhere complaineth, not onely to bee shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, and utterly broken in peeces? Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is unstable and more vnervedfaft than the ebbing and flowing of tides, but what the Lord will doe, when he shall one day fit for the eternall feeling of heauen and earth. As in another place he excellently well describeth it: The foolish doe stay vpon their wealthines, and are proud because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flourish in heauen so great dignitie, can redeem his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransom, but whereas they see that both the wise doe die, and that the wicked also and foole doe perift and leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they waue their names vpon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shall be like to the beasts that die. This imaginacion of theirs is extremly foly, which yet their posteritie doe greedily follow. They shall be placed like a flocke in Hell, and death shall have rule over them. When the light ariseth, the vypright shall have domination over them, the beautie of them shall perift, Hell is their dwelling house. First, this laughing to scorn of the foolish for that they reit on the slippery and rolling good things of the world, doth shew that the wife must seeke a far other felicitie. But there he more evidently discloseth the mystery of the resurrection, where after the destruction and extinguisment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the godly. For what rising of light (I say you) shall we call that, but the recalling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

18. From thence did spring vp that consideration, which the faithfull oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miseries and remedy of patience: It is but a moment in the Lords displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long. where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods kindnes, wherof they fearly felt any little tast? If they had flocke fast vpwn the earth, they could have found no such thing, but because they looked looked upon heaven, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the cross, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, doe last the worlds age. Againe, they did foretell the eternall and ever ending destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shall be in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked most cull. Againe, in Samuel: The Lord shall keepe the feate of the holy, and the wicked shall be put to silence in darke

Nce. Which doe declare that they well knew, that howsoever the holy were diversly carried about, yet their last end is life and salvation: and that the prosperitie of the wicked is a pleasan way, whereby they by little and little slide forward into the gulf of death. Therefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the uncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore David could not devise a more grievous curse then this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19 But aboue all other, notable is that sayinge of Job: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the last day I shall rise againe out of the earth, and in my fielth I shall see God my Saviour: This hope is laid vp in my boosome. Some that have a mind to make a showe of their sharpe wit doe causse that this is not to be understood of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Job looked to have God more gentle to him, which although we grant the in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Job could not have come to that largenesse of hope, if he had rest ed his thought upon the earth. Therefore we must needs confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortalitie to come, which saw, that his redeemer would be present with him, even lying in his grave. For to them that think unkely of this present life, death is their vnto most destruction: which very death could not put off Job's hope. Yea though he kill me (said he) nevertheless I will still hope in him. And let no tripper here carp against me and say, that there were the sayings but of a few, whereby is not pronounced that such doctrine was among the Jews. For I will by and by aanswer him, that these few did not in these sayings utter any secret wisdome, wherein to only certaine excellent wis, were feuerally and privately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appoincted teachers of the people, so they openly published those mysteries of God, that were to be vniterfully learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spiritual life so clearely and plainly in the Church of the Jews, it were a point of vnalterable stubbornes to send them away ancie to the hethly covenant, wherein in mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthines.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophets, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for vs to get the upper hand in David, Job, and Samuel, heere it shalbe much more easie. For God kept this distribution and order in dispensing the covenant of his mercy, that how much the nearer it drew on in progree of time to the full performance thereof, with so much greater increasements of recompence he did day by day more brightly shew it. Therefore at the beginning when the first promise of salvation was made vnto Adam, there glittered out but as it were small sparkes of it. After, having more added vnto it, a greater largenes of light began to be put forth: which from hence foorth brake out more and more, and displayed his brightness farther abroad, till at length all the cloudes were driven away, and Christ the sonne of righteousnesse fully lightened the whole world. We neede not therefore to feare that we lacke of testimonies of the Prophets, if we seeke them to produce our cause, but because I see that there will arise a huge deale of matter, whereupon I should be constraing of necessity to carry longer than the proportion of my purpose may heare Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of beare, for it would so grow to a worke of a great volume, and also because I have alreadie, by those things that I have said before, made plaine the way, even for a reader of meane capacity, so as he may go forward without stumbling: therefore I will at this present abstaine from long tediousnesse: which to do is no lesse necessarie; but giving the readers warning before hand, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we have first given them in their hand. That is, that so oft as the Prophets speake of the blessednesse of the faithfull people, whereof scarcely the least steps are scene in this present life, they may retort to this distincion; that the Prophets the better to expresse the goodnesse of God, did as in a shadow expresse it to the people by temporall benefittes, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they have painted thereof, was such as might rauiish mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elements of this world, and of the age that shall persite, and of the fullnesse which God raised it up to the considering of the seetitie of the life that is to come and spirituall.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being caried away to Babylon, saw their scattering abroad to be like unto death, they could hardly be removed from this opinion, that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophesied to their restitution: because they reckoned it even all one as if he had told them that rotten carcasses should be restored againe to life. The Lord to shew, that even the same difficultie could not stop him from bringing his benefit to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a field full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the one little power of his word he restored breath and liuellnesse. The vision in deed served to corrupt the incredulity at that present time: but in the meanes season he did put the Jews in mind how farre the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which so easie quickeened with his onelie becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherefore you shall compare that with an other saying of Efaie. The dead shall rise, my carcasse, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and rejoice that dwell in the dust, because the deaw of the greene field is thy deaw, and thou shalt placke downe the land of the Giants into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: that thy dores upon thee: hide thee a little while, till my displeasure passe over. For behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visit the iniquitie of the dweller upon the earth against him; and the earth shall shew forth her blood, and shall no longer hide her blaine.

22 Albeit a man should doe fondlie, that would goe about to draw all to such a rule. For there be some places that without anie courting doe shew the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdom of God, of which fort we have recited some, and of like fort are the most part of the rest, especiallie these two, the one in Efaie. As a new heauen, and a new earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your feede stand, and there shall be moneth of moneth, and Sabbath of Sabbath: all flesh shall come to worship before my face, faith the Lord. And they shall go out and see the dead carcasses of the men that have offended against me, that their wormes shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall ride vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sonsne of his people, and there shall come a time of distresse, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people be saved that shall be found written in thy booke. And of those that sleep in the dust of the earth, there shall awake some to eternal life, and some to everlasting shame.

23 Now, as for prouing the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their covenat, and that they repose in him all their affiance of blessing, I will not trouble therein at all, because they have both lesse controversie and more plaineesse. Let us therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the dweller may be remoued, that the old testament, or covenat which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compass of earthly things, but also contained the promises of the spiritual and eternal life: the expectation whereof must needs have been imprinted in all their minds that truly consented to the covenant. But let vs put far away this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Jewses nothing else, or that the Jewses sought nothing else but filling of their belly, delights of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outward power, fruitfulness of children, & whatsoever a natural man esteemeth. For at this Chrift promiseth no other kingdom of heaven to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and Peter affirme, that the Jewses of his time were heirs of the grace of the Gospel for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lord had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not be witnessed with words only, the Lord also approved it by deed. For in the very moment that he rose againe, he vouchsafed to have many of the holy kings to rise againe in company with him, and made them to bee seene in the Citie: so giving an assured token, that whatsoever he did and suffered for the purchasing of eternal salvation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithfull of the old Testament, than unto vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued with the same spirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now when we heare that the same spirit, which is in vs a certaine spark of immortallitie, whereupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is so much the more maruell, that in the old time the Sadduces fell to such grossnes of error, that they denied both the resurrection and also the substance of soules, both which points they faile in with soe cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no lesse to be manueled at, even at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdom of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should haue that punishment for refusing the Gospel. For so it becometh, by the just judgement of God, to strike those minds with blindness, which in refusing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themselues into darkenes. Therefore they read and continually turne our Moses, but they are stopped with a veile betwene them and him, that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shall it remaine covered and hidden from them, till he be turned to Christ, from whom now they travaile to lead and draw him away so much as in them lieth.

Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

W hat then? wilt thou say: shall there be no difference left betweene the olde Testament and the New? and to what purpose serue all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrarie? I doe willingly allow these differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the matter already established, as it shall be plaine to see when we shall have intreated them in order. Those differences are (as farre as cue I could marke or can remember) chiefly soure in number, to the which if you lift to adjoyne the fift, I am not against it. I say and trst to proove that they are all such as rather belong to the manner of ministraction, than to the substance of them. And by this meanes they shal nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the old and new Testament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, even in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the minde of his people, and to have them vailed up to the heavenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gave it to bee seene or rather to bee tasted of, under earthly benefits: but nowe having revealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospel, he more clearly and plainly plainly directeth our mindes the straight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exercing which he used with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpofe of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any higher than to the good things promis'd to the bodie. They too often heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods lawe. They heare that God threatneth nothing more severely to the transgressors of the fame lawe, than that they shall be driven out of the possession of the fame land, and scattered abroad into strange regions. They see in a manner to this effect come all the blessings & curfes that are pronounced by Moses. Hereby they do undoubtedly determine, that the Jews, not for their own sakes, but for others, were sever'd from other nations, that is, that the church of Christ might have an image, in whose outward forme the might see examples of spiritual things. But fith the Scripture doth fomtimes shew, that God himfelfe directed all the earthly benefits that he did for them to this end, that he might lead the by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefits; it was too much vnkinfulnes, I wil not fay blockifhnes, not to consider this order of disposition. The influence or point of our controversy with this fort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of the land of Chanaan was to the Israelites their chief & left blessednes, and that to vs after the revealeing of Christ, it doth but figurativly signifie the heavenly inheritance. On the other fide we affirm, that they did in the earthly possession which they enjoyed, as in a looking glasse behold the inheritance to come which they beleued to be prepared for them in heaven.

2 That itall better appear by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galatians. He comparath the nation of the Jews to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to governe himfelfe, followeth the guideing of the tutor or schoolmaster, to whose custodie he is committed, and whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindreth but that it may alfo vnerfily ferve to this purpofe. The fame inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs; but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacitie to enter vpon and vfe. The fame church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lord kept them vnder this schoolinge, that he gave them not the spiritual promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posteritie unto hope of immortalitie, he promised them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirmethemselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare: And that they might not be deceived, there was given them a higher promise to refirfe that that land was not the higheft benefit of God. So Abraham was not sufferd to lie floutheall in the promise receiv'd of the land, but his mind was with a greater promise rais'd vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heare this said vnto him: I am thy protefter, and thy reward exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward fet forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transitorie and slippery reward in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be as can not wither away. Afterward he adoineth the promise of the land to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayings do declare. So David raiseth reward from temporal blessings, to that fame higheft and left blessing, My hart (faith he) and my feth, faine for desire of thee, God is my portion for ever. Again, the Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that taught mine inheritance for me. Again, I have cried vnto thee, O Lord, I have faide, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Truly they that dare so speake, doe without doubt profess that with their hope they clime above the worldes, and all the good things here present. But the Prophets do oft describe this blessednesse of the worldes to come, vnder under the figure that they had received of the Lorde. And so are these sayings to be understood. That the godly shall possesse the land by inheritance, and the wicked shall be destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kinde of riches, and Sion overflow with plenty all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true country of the faithfull, and that heavenly citie wherein the Lorde hath commanded blessing and life for euer.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the olde testament did thence the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is nowe meete to do. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to minde what marke of his grace the Lorde had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the small rate of their tendernes, they felt the greater sweetenes of it, than if they had considered it of it selfe. But as the Lord in testifying his good will toward the faithfull, by present good things, did in shadowe express the spiritual felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines them examples of his judgement against the reprobate. Therefore as the benefits of God were to be scene in earthy things so were also his punishements. While the vsuskillfull do not weare this comparison or agreement, as I may call it between the punishments and the rewards, they maruell at so much alteration in god, that in old time was so tenderly ready to take vengeance on euery offence of man with severe and horrible punishments, and nowe as if he had laid away the affection of his old angines, he punishteth both much more gently & seldom, yea, & for the same cause they do almost imagine severall gods of the old and new testament; which the Manichees did in deed. But we shall easily be deluert from such doubtes, if we lay our minde to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporall benefits, and the greuousness of the spiritual death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deluert his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded vp.

4 Another difference of the old and new testament is laid to be in the figures: for that the old testament did show one ly an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in stead of the body. But the new testament gueth the truth present, and the founde body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wherefoever the newe testament is in comparision set against the olde: but it is more largely entreated of in the Epistle to the Hebrews than any where else. There the apostle disputeth against them, which thought that the obseruation of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they shoule also drawe with them the ruine of religion. To confute this errore, hee fetth that which had beene forespoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthood of Christ. For whereas there is given him an eternall priesthood, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, wherein new expiaces were daily put in, one after another. But hee pronoueth that the institution of this newe priesthod is to be preferred, because it is establisht with an other. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthood, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, he pronoueth by this reason: for that the weakeenesse of the law was such that it could help no thing to perfection. Then he proceeded in declaring what was that weakeenesse, even this, that it had certaine outward righteousnes of the flesh, which could not make the obseruants of them perfect, according to conscience: that by satisfaces of bullettes, it coulde neither wipe away sinnes, nor purchase true holinesse. He conclude therefore that there was in it a shadowe of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the things themselves: and that therefore it had no other office, but to bee as an introduction into a better hope, which is deluert in the Gospel. Herefore it is to bee, in what point the covenant of the law...
Cap. 11. Of the knowledge of law is compared with the covenant of the Gospel, and the ministration of Christ, with the ministrations of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then there was great difference between the two testaments: but if the point of our case leadeth us another way, we must tend to this end, to find out the truth. Let us then set forth here the covenant which he hath established to be eternal, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attainted to be established and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to see as it were solemn signs of the confirmation. Now this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to give place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verily additions and things adjoined, or (as the people call them) accessory things to the covenant, yet because they were instruments or means of the administration thereof, they bear the name of the covenant it self, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in summe: the old Testament is in this place called the solemn forme of confirming the covenant, contained in ceremonies and sacrifices. The apostle faith, that because it is nothing perfect, unless we passe further, therefore it behoved that they should be discontinued and abrogated that place might be given to Christ the Architect and mediator of a better testament, by whom eternal sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or if you like it better, thus: That the olde testament of the Lord was that which was deliver'd, wrapped vp in the shadowish and effectual obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspense until it might take upon a more settled and substantial confirmation: and that then only it was made newe and eternall, after that it was consecrate and stablished by the bloud of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gave at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new Testament in his bloud: to signifie that then the testament of God attainted his truth: by which it becometh new and eternall, when it is sealed with his bloud.

The kingdom is nowe manifested which in former times was darklie beheld.

Gal. 3. 24 & 4.

5 Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle saith, that in the schooling of the law, the Jews were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were children and heirs of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolmaster. For it behoved, that ere the sonne of righteousness was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightness of revelation, nor so great deepes of understanding. Therefore God gave them in measure the light of his word, that they saw it as yet farre off and darkely. Therefore Paul expresseth this slendernes of understanding by the tearme of young age, which the Lordes will was to have to be exercized with the elements of this world, and with outward obseruations, as rules of instruction for children vntil Christ should shine abroad, by whom it behoved that the knowledge of the faithfull people should grow to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe ment of, when he said, that the law and the prophets' were vntil John, and that from thence forth the kingdom of God is preached. What did the law and the Prophets open to men of their time? even this, they gave a taste of that wisdom which in time to come should be plainly discover'd: and they shewed it before as it were twinklingly shining a far off. But when it came to passe that Christ might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdom of God fet open. For in him are laid abroad the treasures of all wisdom and understanding, whereby we attaine, even in a maner, into the secret closets of heaven.

Matt. 11. 13.

Col. 1. 9.

The Prophets shewed not so clearly knowledge Christ, but this 6 And it maketh not against us, that there can scarce any one be found in the christian Church, that in excellency of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophets excelled in such force of spirit, that even at this day they lighten the the whole world withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lord hath bestowed upon a few, but what ordinary disposition he vtd in teaching his people; such as is declared in the Prophets themselves, which were endued with peculiar knowledge above the rest. For even their teaching is darker and enclosed in figures, as of things a far off. Moreover how marvellous knowledge sower appeared in them above other, yet forasmuch as they were driven of necessity to submit them to the common childish instruction of the people, they themselves also were reckoned in number of children. Finally, there never chanced any such exercise sight to any at that time, but that it did in some part savour of the darkenesse of the time. Whereupon Christ said, Many kings and Prophets have desired to see the things that ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear the things that ye hear, and have not heard them. Therefore blessed are your eyes, because they see, and your ears because they hear. And truly it is meete that the presence of Christ should have this excellency of prerogative, that from it should arise the exercise reawakening of the heavenly mysteries. And for this purpose alse maketh that, which even nowe we alluged out of the first Epistle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their travell was profitable, principally for our age.

7 Nowe I come to the thirde difference, which is taken out of Jeremie, whose words are these: Behold the day shall come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and the house of Judah, not according to the covenant that I made with your fathers, in the day when I took them by the hand, to lead them out of the land of Egypt, the covenant that they made voide, although I ruled over them: But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their harts, and I will be merciful to their iniquity. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother, For they shall all know me, from the least unto the most. Of which words the Apostle took occasion to make this comparison betweene the law and the Gospel, that he called the law a literal, and the Gospel a spirituall doctrine: the law, he said, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospel written in harts: that the law was the preaching of death, the Gospel the preaching of life: the law the preaching of damnation, the Gospel the preaching of righteousness: that the law is made voide, that the Gospel abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that we weigh the words of one of them, to attain the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some vnsimilitude betweene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doth: and that not in simple respect of the law, but because there were certaine naughtie men, having a wrong zeale to the law, which did with peruerse loue of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospel. He dispauseth the nature of the law, according to their error and foolish affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they do by comparison set the olde and the new Testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The lawe doth commonly in suierie place containe promises of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elswhere, therefore they are not reckoned as part of the lawe, when the meere nature of the lawe is spoken of. The onely thing they ascribes vnto it, to command things, that are right, and to forbid wicked doings: to promise rewarde to the followers of righteousness, and to threaten punishment to the transgressors: but in the mean time neither to change nor amend the peruerse harte of hart, that is naturally in all men.

8 Now let us expound the Apostles comparison, one piece after another. The old Testament is literal, because it was published without the effectuall working of the spirtue: The new is spirituall which the Lord hath spiritually drawn in the harts of men: Therefore the second diversitie is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can do nothing but wrapp all mankind within the curse: The new is the instrument of life, because it delivereth from curse, and restoreth into favour with God. The old is the ministerie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vniighteousnesse: The new is the ministerie of righteousnesse, because it recealeth the mercie of God, by which we are made righteous. The last diversitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the old testament had an image of things absent, it behoued that it should in time decay & vanish away: but the Gospel, because it gusheth the true bodie in deede, keepeth full a firme and perpetual fastnesse. Jeremeie indeed calleth euem the morall law a weake and fraile covent: but that is for another reason, because by the sudden falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by and by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cannot properly be laid upon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weaknesse were dissolved by the comming of Christ, had the cause of their weaknesse within themselves. Nowe, that difference of the letter and spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Ieues without any fruit at all, having none of them converted vnto him. But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduance the abundance of grace, werewith the fame lawmaker as it were putting on a new perfonage, did honorably setfooth the preaching of the Gospel. For if we reckon vp the multitude of them, whom the Lord out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospel regenerat with his spirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, we shall say, that there were very fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israel, that with affection of minde and entirely from their hart imbraced the covent of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

9 Out of the thirde difference rifeth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the old Testament, the testament of bondage, for that it engendreth feare in mens minds: but the newe Testament, the testament of libertie, because it raileth them vp to confidence and auflerednesse. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romanes. Yee have not receiued the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirite of adoption, by which we cry Abba Father. Hereunto Jeremiaueth that in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the faithfull are not nowe come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whilte-winde, darkenesse and tempest, where nothing can bee hearde or scene but that striketh mens minde with terror, in so much that Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice founded, which they all besought, that they might not heare: But that we are come to the Mount Sion, and the cite of the huuing God, the heavenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that we have allaged out of the Epistle to the Romanes, hee setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galathians, when hee maketh an allegorie of the two fones of Abraham, after this manner, that Agar the bond woman is a figure of the Mount Sinai, where the people of Israel receiued the lawe: Sara the free woman is a figure of the heavenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospel. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which may never come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the law we are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospel onely we are regenerate into freedom. But the former commeth to this effect that the olde Testament did strike into confences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made ioyfull. The old did holde confences bounde vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedom. But if out of the people of Israel they object against vs the holy fathers, who say it is evident, that they were endued with the same spirite that we are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfesame freedom and ioie.
We answer, that neither of both came of the law. But that when they felt themselves by the law to be both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with uneasiness of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospel, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruit of the new Testament, that beside the common law of the old testament they were exempted from these evils. Moreover, we will deny that they were so endued with the spirit of freedom and assuredness, that they did not in some part feel both fear and bondage by the law. For howsoever they enjoyed that prerogative which they had obtained by grace of the Gospel, yet were they subject to the same bonds and burdens of obligation, that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to the carefull keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like unto bondage, and the handwritings whereby they confessed themselves guiltie of sinne, did not discharge them from being bond; it may rightfull be said, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while we have respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vised with the people of Israel.

10 The three last comparisons that we have recited, are of the lawe and the Gospel. Wherefore in them by the name of the Olde Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospel. The first stretched further, for it comprehended vnder it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckoned vnder the name of the old testament, therein he thought very well, and meant even the same thing that we do now teach; for he had regard to those sayings of Hieremye and Paul, where the olde testament is feuered from the word of mercie and grace. And this also he verie aptly adiogneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through love have obeyed the commandements, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the New testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthe and temporall, but spiritual, heauenlie, and eternal good things, principallie beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirit was not ministr'd vnto them, both to do good, and to have pardon so oft as they sinn'd. For the same thing is it that I minded to affirm, that all the Saints whom the Scripture rehearsed to have beene from the beginning of the world chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe fame blessing with vs vnto eternal salvation. This difference therefore is betwenee our division and Augustines; that ours (according to that sayings of Christ: The lawe and the Prophets were vnto John: from thencefoorth the kingdom of God is preached) doth make distinction betwenee the elecctnesse of the Gospel, and the darker distribution of the word that went before: and Augustine doth onely feuer the weakenesse of the law from the strength of the Gospel. And heere also is to be noted concerning the holy fathers, that they so lovd vnder the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alwaye aspired to the newe, yea and imbraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednesse: which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minds vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the cleansing of the soul by outward sprinkling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though he were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities do they fall, that sticke fast in the observations of the law without respect of Christ.

11 The fifth difference that we may add, lieth in this; that vntill the comming of Christ the Lord had chosen one nation, within which he would keepe seuerall the covenant of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he divided the sonnes of Adam (as by Moses) his people fell to his pollution; Abra the cord of

of his inheritance. In another place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heaven and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy God. He cleaned only to thy fathers, he loved them to choose their seed after them, even your felues out of all nations. Therefore he vouchsafed to grant the knowledge of his name to that people only, as if they only of all men belonged vnto him: he laide his covenent as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the preence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatives. But (to omit the rest of his benefites, and speake that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to doe with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, give them that which was onely the remedie, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sonne that was his dearling, other were strangers: Israel was knowne to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nigh vnto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that fame reconciler of God and men was deliuered indeede, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long helden the mercie of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were farre off, even as to them that were neere adioyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might growe into one people. Wherefore, now there is no respect of Greece or Jew, circumcision or vn circumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whom the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniverfally without difference he might have dominion from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the uttermost endes of the world.

The calling of the Gentiles under the new testament spoken of by the Prophet, not sudenly proceded vnto by Christ, by the apostles feare admisted, wondere at the very angels themselves.

12. Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable tken, whereby is cleerly shewed the excellencie of the new Testament above the olde. It had in deede bene before teftifiied by many, and most plaine oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still deferred vnto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himselfe did not proceede vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but deferred it fo long vntill that all the parts of our redemption being performed, and the time of his abatement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is about all names: before whom all knees shoule bow. For which cause when this conuenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Chanaan, that he was not sent but to the loft sheape of the house of Israel. And he suffred not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye (as the he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the loft sheape of the house of Israel. But how souer it was before vtered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to begin it, it seemed so newe and strange a thing vnto them, that they were afraide of it, as of some monter. Truely very fearefully and not without flieking at it they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lorde which by so many ages had chosen our Israel from all other nations, should now vndo that choise, as it were suddenly changing his purpose. It was indeede spoken off afo re by prophecies: but they could not gue so great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing moued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lorde had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that should one day come to passe, were not sufficient to moove them. For beseide this that hee had called very fewe, hee did after a certaine manner ingraffe them into the houyhole of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as parell of them: but by this generall calling the Gentiles were not only made equal with the Jews, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Jews, that were became dead. And yet all those strangers whom God hath before that time brought into the body of the Church, were never made equall with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll his mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which Col. 1.16, he also saith to be maruellous to the verie Angels.

13 In these foure or five points, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set forth the whole difference of the old and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this variety in gouerning the Church, this diuerse manner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be aunswered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may be done shortly, because the objections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (fay they) that God which dooth alway steadfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as afterward to disallow the same thing, which he had before both commanded and commended. I answer, that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied diuerse forms to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expedient for every one. If the husbandman appoint to his householde one sort of businesse in winter, and an other in sommer, shall we therefore accuse him of inconfancie, or thinke that he swarumeth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeeth with the continuall order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household do instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in chilhood, of another in youth, and of another in mans estate, we cannot therefore say that he is fickle and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore do we charge God with reproch of inconfancie, for that he hath feuered the diuerse of times, with fit and agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Iewes like vnto children and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this gouernement of God that he helde them in their childish lessons, which according to the capacitie of their age were fit for them, and instructed vs with stronger and as it were more manly discipline. Therefore herein appeareth the constancie of God, that he taught one selfe same doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commended from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward forme and manner thereof, in that he shewed not himselfe subject to change: but so farre he tempered himselfe to the capacitie of man, which is divers and changeable.

14 But whence (fay they) commeth this diuersitie, but because God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning, as since the comming of Christ, reveale the eternall life in plaine words without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacraments and easie to perceive, giue his holy spirit, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is even like as if they should quarrel with God for that he hath created the world so late, sith he might have created it from the beginning; or for that his will was to have enterchaged courses betweene winter and sommer, betweene day and night. But as for vs, even as all godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubt that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righetheously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to have beene done. For that were to take presumpuously too much vpon vs, not to give God leave to have the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (fay they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrifying of beasts, and all that furniture of the Leuitical priesthood, wherewith in the old time he was delightt: As though these outward and transtorie things did delute God, or any way moue affection in him. We have already said that he did none of these for his own cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of man. If a Phisition do heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, and afterward do we another manner of healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the manner of healing which before pleaseth him, but rather continuing still in the same, he he hath consideration of age? So behoved it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signs, and by another sort be before showed that he was to come: and it is meete that now being already delivered, he be represented by other signs. But concerning God’s calling, now at the coming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy Ghost more plentifully poured out: who, I pray you, can deny it to be right, that God have in his owne hand and will the disposing of his owne graces, to gie light to what nations it pleased him? to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to give what doctrine and how great profiting, and successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulness? and againe when he will to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therefore, that the causations are too much vnmeete, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the minds of the simple, to make them call either the rightousnesse of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That it behoved that Christ, to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

Now it much behoved vs that he should be both God & man, which should be our Mediator. If a man ask of the necessitie, it was not indeede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceedeth from the heavenly decree, whereupon hanged all the saluation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which should be best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud betweene him and vs, and utterly excluded vs from the kingdom of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attaine vs to God. But who could have attained vs to him? could any of the sones of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shun the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and unfeuerably cleave vs to God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very majestie of God would descend vs to, for we could not ascende vs to it. So it behoved that the Son of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither could the neerenesse be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betweene our filthinesse, and the most pure cleanness of God. Although man had stood vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediator. What could he then doe being plunged downe into death and hell with deadly fall, defiled with so many spots, stinking with his owne corruption, and overwhelmed with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to fet forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (faith he) of God and man, the man Jesus Christ. He might have said, God: or at the least he might have left the name of Man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth knew our weaknesse: therefore to provide for it in time, he vfed a most fit remedie, setting among vs the sone of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, he putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea so neere that he toucheth vs, for as much as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there cenn the same thing that in another place is set out with moe words: that we have not a bishop that cannot have compassion of our infirmities, for as much as he was in all things tempted as we are, only sinne excepted.
2 That shall also appeare more plainly, if we consider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, to restore vs into the favour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hell, the heires of the kingdom of heaven. Who could do that, unlesse the sonne of God were made alfo the sonne of man, and to take ours vpon him to conuoy his vs to vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this carnal we trust, that we are the children of God, because the natural sonne of God hath shapen for himselfe a body of our body, fleshe of our fleshe, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. He disdained not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himselfe, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of God and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhoode which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he faid: I go vp to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. By this meanes is the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven affur'd vnto vs: for that the onely sonne of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: because if we be brethren, than are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same caufe very profitable, that he which should be our redeemer, should be both very God and very man. It was his office to swallow vpon death: who could doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to overcome sin: who could do that but righteousness it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the world, and of the aire: who could do that but a power above both world and aire? Now in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and power of heaven, but in God alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onely begotten sonne, made himselfe our redeemer, when his will was to have vs redeemed.

3 Another principal point of our reconciliation with God was this, that man which had lost himselfe by his disobedience, should for remedy set obedience against it, should satisfy the judgement of God, and pay the penalty of sin. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and took vp him his name to enter into his stead in obeying his father, to yield our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the just judgement of God, and in the same fleshe suffer the pains that we had deferved. For so much as therefore neither being onely God, he could feel death, nor being onely man he could overcome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one subject to death to satisfy for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wrangle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore that spoile Christ either for his godhead or for his manhood, do indeede either diminish his majestie and glorie, or obscure his goodness: but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they do thereby weaken and overthrow, which cannot stand but resting vpon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and David, which God had promis'd in the law and the Prophets. Wherby the godly minded do gather this other fruites, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to David and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I even now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature betweene him and vs is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death and sin together, that the victorie so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he received of vs, that having made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltines, and appease the just wrath of his father.

4 He that shall be diligentlyheedfull in considering these things as he ought, will easily neglect these wandering speculations that rauih vnto them light spirits. and defirous of nouelties: of which fort is, that Christ should have beene man, although there had beene no need of remedie to redeeme mankind. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature uncorrupted, he was set as head over Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all cretures. But sith all the scripture crieth out that he was cloathed with flesh, that he might be the redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or end.
To what ende Christ was promisit from the beginning, it is well ynowen known: enu to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore under the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God would be mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euin when the lawe was not yet published, the Mediator was never promised without blood: we gather that he was appointed by the eternall counsell of God to purge the filthines of men, for that the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of Esaias shall suffice vs for all, where he foretelleth, that he shall be stricken with the hand of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be upon him: and that he should be a priest that should offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his woundes should come health to other: and that, because all have strayed and been scattered abroad like sheep, therefore it pleased God to pun-nish him, that he might bear the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, whoeouer paffeth byonde thee bounds, he doeth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himselfe was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming to appease God, and gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles teftifie of him. So John before that he teacheth that the Word was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speakeoth thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gave his only begotten sonne, that whoeouer beleueth in him should not perire, but have everlasting life.
Againe: The house is come that the dead shall hear the voice of the sonne of God, and they that hear it, shall live. I am the resurrection and life: he that beleueth in me, although he be dead, shall live. Againe, The sonne of man commeth to faine that which was loft. Againe: The whole need not a Phisition. I should never make an end, if I should reheare all. The Apostles doe all with one consentual vs to this fountaine.
And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honour of the priesthoode should have come to nought. For as much as the priest appointed meane betweene God and man to make intercession: and he should not be our righteousenes, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he should be spoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the scripture doth let him out. And also that saying of Paul should proove vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, God hath lent his owne sonne, that in likenes of the flesh of sin he should satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the goodnes of God and his infinite goodnes toward men, when Christ was given to be the redeemer. Finally, the scripture euery where alsigneth no other end why the sonne of God would take vp him our flesh, and also received this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father toward vs. So it is written, and so it becommeth that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loueth me, because I give my life for the sheepe, this commandement he gave me. As Moses lifted vp the Serpent in the defert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place: Father, saue me from this hous, But I am therefore come euin to this hous. Father, glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainly speakeoth of the ende why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sort doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise given to the fathers, to give light to them that sit in the shadow of death. Let vs remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in another place lcttlieth, that all the treasurers of knowledge and wisdome are hidden, and besides whom he glorifieth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things proove the contrarie, but that the same Chrifl thai redeemed men being damned might also in putting on their flesh testify his love toward them, being preferred and safe. The answer is short, that so farre much as the holy Ghost pronounceth, that by the eternal decree of God these two things were joyned together, that Chrifl should be our redeemer, and also partake of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawfull for vs to search any further. For whoseuer is tickled with desire to know any more, he being not contented with the unchangeable ordinance of God, doth sweeue also that he is not contented with the same Chrifl that was giuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth what end he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predetermination, he vere fully representeth all wantonneffe and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Chrifl before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloved sonne, in whom we have redemption by his bloud. Truly here is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to helpe the miferie of mankind. If the aduersarie object againe, that this purpose of God did hang upon the fall of man which he did foresee : it is enough and more for me to say that they with wicked boldnesse brake foorth to frame them a new Chrifl, whoseuer satisfie them to search for more, or hope to know more of Chrifl then God hath foreappointed them by his secret decree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Chrifl, with to the Ephesians the spirit of understanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, breath, & depth, even the loute of Chrifl that surmounteth all knowledge: even as if of purpose he woulde set barres about our minde, that when mention is made of Chrifl, they should not, be it sooner so little, swerve from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sith this is a faithfull saying(as Paul testified) that Chrifl is come to saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now declared by the Gospel, was giuen vs in Chrifl before the times of the worlde: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Against this modestie of saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in another place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now declared by the Gospel, was giuen vs in Chrifl before the times of the worlde: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the end. Cap. 12. Of the knowledge of

6. But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would have it that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashioned after the pattern of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to cloath with our flesh. Whereupon he gathereth, that if Adam had never fallen from his first and uncorrupted original state, yet Christ should have been man. How tripping this is and wrested, all men that have found judgement, doe easily perceive of themselves. In the meantime first he thinketh that he hath seen what was the image of God, that forsooth the glory of God did not only shine in those excellent gifts wherein he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I grant that Adam did bear the image of God, in so much as he was joined to God (which is the true and highest perfection of dignity) yet I say, that the likeness of God is no where else to be sought, but in those marks of excellency wherein he had garnished Adam above other living creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men doe grant with one consent, and therefore that whatsoever excellency was granted in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approched to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to have his glory scene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he advanced by the benefice of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same son was a common head as well to Angels as to men, so that the same dignity that was bestowed upon man, did also belong unto Angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconvenient to deny, that there is something in them wherein they resemble their father. Now if his will was to have his glory to be represented as well in Angels as in men, and to be scene in both natures, Osander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behind men, because they did not bear the image of Christ. For they could not continually enjoy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleave together under one head. Finally, if we believe Christ, this shall be our last felicitie, to be made of like fourme to the Angels, when we shall be received vp into heauen. But if Osander will conclude, that the original pattern of the image of God was in Christ as he is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needs have beene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth alse to them.

7. Therefore, Osander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a liar, vnlesse it had beene first destroyed and unchangeable decreed in his minde, to have his sonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he should with the Angels have beene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore have beene necessary, that the sonne of God should be made either man or Angel. And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the unchangeable counsell of God had beene before the creation of man that Christ should be borne, not as the redeemer but as the fist man, he should have lost his prerogative: for so much as now hee should be borne manely by an accident caule, that is to restore mankinde being lost, and so might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should hee so much abhor that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that he was made like vnto vs in all things, except sinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to reckon him the Sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine know why Paul calleth Christ the second Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should have beene called the first Adam. Osander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was already before knowne man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same patterne. But Paul in naming him the second second Adam, setteth meane betwene the first beginning of man and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to have nature restored to his first degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the Sonne of God was borne to become man. In the mean while, Ofiander reasoneth ill and unskilfully, that Adam, folong as he had stand without falling, should have beene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answer the contrary, because though the Sonne of God had never put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body & in the soule of man should have shined the image of God, in the bright beames whereof it alwaye appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the soueraine supremacie in all. And so is it foolish subteltie foiled, which Ofiander bloweth abroad, that the Angels should have lacked this head, vnlesse it had beene purpose d by God to clothe his Sonne with flesh, yea, though there had beene no fault of Adam. For he doth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath no supremacie ouer Angels, that they should haue him for their Prince, but infomuch as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the wordes of Paul, that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures, not that he is created, or ought to be reckoned among creatures: but because the state of the world in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beautie, had no other original: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For the Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all thinges were create by the Sonne, that he might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might begin to be the Redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he faith, that men should not haue had Christ to their King, if he haue not beene man. As though the kingdome of God could not stand, if the eternall Sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the fellowshipp of his heavenly glory and life, should himselfe beare the soueraine integritie. But in this false principle he is alway deceived, or rather deceinteth himselfe, that the Church should haue beene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, even as the Angels enjoyed him their head, he could not likewise by his divine power rule over men, and by the secret force of his spirite quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heaven, they might enjoy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Ofiander accounteth for most stronge oracles: even so as being drunk with the sweetness of his owne speculations, he veth to blow out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he faith is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this now is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But how pronoueth he that to be a prophecie? Because in Mat heu Christ giueth the same saying to God. As though that whatsoever God hath spoken by men, conteneth some prophecie. Let Ofiander scke prophecies in every Commandement of the Law, which, it is certaine to haue come from GOD the Author of them. Beside that, Christ should haue bene grossie and earthy, if hee had rested upon the literal sense. Because he speakeith not of the mysticall vyon whereunto he hath vouchsafed to receive his Church, but only of faithfullistie betwenee man and wife: for this cause he teacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shall be one flesh, that no man should attempt to brake that insoluble knot by diuorce. If Ofiander loath this simplicite, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his disciples further to a mysterie, in more subtelly expounding the saying of his Father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his errour, which after he had saide that we are flesh of the flesh of Christ by and by addeth, that this is a great mysterie, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure and similitude of marriage to set forth the holy coupling together, that maketh vs one with Christ.
Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of Christ. And so doe the words found. Because when he giveth warning that he speake- keth this of Christ and his Church, he doth as it were by way of correction, i.e., the spirituall ioyning of Christ and his Church from the lawe of marriage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I think I need no more to shake vp any more of that sort of chaffe, because the vanitie of them all is loone found out by this short confutation. But this sobriete shall aboundantlie suffice to seede soundly the children of God: than when this fulness of times was come, the Sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

That Christ tooke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

Now vnlesse I be deceived, it were superfluous to entreate againe of the Godhead of Christ, which hath alreadie in another place beeene proued with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seen, how he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The truth of his humane nature hath in the old time beeene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom, the Marcionites saide a ghoft in seede of the body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heavenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture do stand against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heavenly seede, nor in the counterfeit shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the Sonne of David, and to the fruite of his wombe. Therefore being delivered in the flesh, he is called the Sonne of David and Abraham: not because he is only borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seede of David: as in another place the Apostle teacheh, that he descended of the Iewes. For which cause the Lord himselfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himselfe the Sonne of man, meaning to express more plaine ly that he was man truely issu'd of the seede of mankinde. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many meanes, with so great diligence and simplicitie declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who would have thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet wee haue other testimonies afoot, if we lifted to heape vp more of them. As is that saying of Paul: that God sent his Sonne made of woman.

And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subject to hunger, thirst, cold, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be chosen, that may most auaile to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gave not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him but tooke our nature, that in flesh and bloud he might, by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Againe, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Againe, that he ought to have bin made like unto his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull & faithfull intercessor: that we have not a bishop that cannot be commissionate of our infirmities, and such like. And for the same purpose serueth that which we touched a little before, that it behooved that the sinnes of the world should be cleansed in our flesh, which Paul plainly affirmeth. And truely, whatsoever the father hath given to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to vs, because he is the head, from which the whole bodie being knit together, growth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is faide: that the Spirit was giuen him without measure, that all we should draw of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence.
God the Redeemer. Lib. 2. 124

effence by any accidental gift. And for this cause Christ faith in another place: I doe sanctifie my selue for them.

2. As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their errour, they doe too vnaptly wrest them, and they nothing prove by their trifling suttleties, when they goe about to wipe away those things that I have alledged for our part. Marcian imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastical body in fleede of a true bodie: because in some places it is said, that he was made after the likeness of a man, and that he was found in shap[e as a man. But so he nothing weigheth what is Pauls pur-pound that place of Peter could not stand together, that he was dead in the fleth, but quickened in the spirit, if the Sonne of God had not beene weake in the nature of man: which Paul expresseth more plainly in saying, that he suffered by reason of the weaknesse of the fleth. And hereunto seteth the exaltation : becau because it is expressly said, that Christ attained a new glory after that he abased himselue, which coulde not well agree to be spoken of, but of a man hauing fleth and soul. Manichees framed Christ a body of aire, because Christ is called the second Adam, heavenly of heauen. But neither in that place doth the Apostle bring in a heavenly effence of the bodie, but a spirituall force which being pow-red abroad by Christ, doth quicken vs. And Christ is not a body of aire: becau to call them brethren. For if he had said before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignity, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioyne himselfe to the base and ynnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they object, that by this meanse the wickede shall become the brethren of Christ: because we know that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghoft by faith. Therefore onely flesh maketh not a brotherly ynoyng. But although the Apostle giveth this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, that but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when we say that Christ was made man, to make vs the fones of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meanse which spiritually graffeth vs into the bodie of Christ. Also they foolishly mooue a brawl about the name of Fust begotten. They say that Christ should have beene borne of Adam straight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of Fust begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellencie of power. And more colour hath that which they babbe, that Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he received mankind into favour. For, to set out more largely the honour which God vouchsafed to gue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfset behind vs And if the seles monie of Moses be wel weied, where he faith that the fede of the woman shal breake the serpentes head, it shal vterly end the controverse. For onely Christ is not there spoken of, but al mankind. Because the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, he generally pronounceth that the pottererie of the woman shal get the upper hand of the duell. Whereunto followeth, that Christ is born of mankind, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Eue, whom he spake vnto with good hope, that the should not faint with sorrow.

The stiffish which now Marciantes have to avoid the evidence of scripture which maketh against them Gal.3:18.

Rom.1:3. Eph.3:11.

3 They do no leffe wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the fede of Abraham, and the fruit of the wombe of David. For if the name of Seede had been spoken in an allegorie, truely Paul would not have left it vntold, where he plainly and without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sones of Abraham redeemers: but one Christ. Of like fort is it that they alledge that he is no otherwisse called the son of David, but because he was promis-fed & at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the son of God: in that he by and by addeth, According to the flesh, he truly meane-theth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, his faith seuerally beside, that according to the flesh he descended of the Jews. Now if he were not truely begotten of the seede of David, to what purpose shal be this saying, that he is the fruit of his wombe? What meane-theth this promise? Out of thy loynes shall he descende, that shall abide in thy stae. Now in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is relicteof of Matthew, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though he do not rehearce the parents of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because he speake of a thing sufficiently knowne abroad among the people, he recketh it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the seede of David, when it was well knowne that Marie was of the same stocke. But Luke more expressith them in teaching that saluation brought by Christ, is common to all mankind: because Christ the author of saluation proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I grant in seede, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwisse be gathered that Christ was the sonne of David, but so much as he was begotten of the Virgme. But the new Marciantes tincture their error do too proudly, in this that to prooue that Christ tooke his body of nothing, they affirm that women are seedles, and so they overthrow the principles of nature. But because that is no question of divinitie, & the reasons that they bring are so sackle that they may verie easly be confuted: therefore I will not touch those things that belong to Philosophie and Physicke, and will hold me contented to wipe away those things that they all edge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ithiabah tookewives of the tribe of Ithiabah, and so the difference of tribes had then been confounded; if woman had engendering seed in her. But is well known that as touching civil order, the kindreds are reckoned by the seede of the man, and yet the excellency of the kinde of man above woman prooueth not the contrary, but that in generation the seed of woman must meste. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men only: shall we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But very children doe know, that women are comprehended under the name of men. And after this sort is saide, that women bring forth to their husbandes, because the name of the houshold alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellency of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnynoble, according to the state of their fathers: so also in the state of bondage the issue followeth the wombe, according to the judgement of the civil lawyers. Whereby we may gather, the issue is engendred of the seed of the woman. And it hath of long time bin received in common use of all nations, that the mothers are called Generices, that is engenders. Wherewith Gods law also agreeeth, which else should wrongfully forbid the marriage of the ynde with his sisters daughter, because there were no confin-guntary betweene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marry his sister by the mothers side, so that the were begotten of another father. But as I grant that there is a passuie power ascribed to women, so do I answer that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not said to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie shaking off all shaine do too lightly aske, whether we will say that Christ was engendered of the meniuall seede of the Virgin, for I will likewise aske of them, whither he did not congeale in the bloud of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confess. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Mathewes wordes, that because Christ was begotten of Marie, he was engendered of her seede; as a like engendering is ment when it is saide, that Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Mathew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he feuereth this miraculous manner of generation from the common manner, for that by her was Christ begotten of the seede of David. For even in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of David, and Ioseph of Jacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Evangelist do frameth the order of his speech, and willing to prove that Christ came of David, is contented with this one reason, that she was begotten of Marie. Whereby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Marie was of kinne to Ioseph.

4. The absurdities wherewith they would charge vs, are stuffed full of childish caullations. They think it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he should have taken his original of men: because he so could not be exempt from the vnuerse lawe that encloseth all the offspring of Adam without exception under sinne. But the comparison that we reade in Paul doth easily affoile this doubt: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnes of on man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeeth another comparison of his: the first Adam of earth earthly, and naturally, the second of heaven heavenly. Therefore in another place, the same Apostle, where he teacheth that Christ was sent in the likeness of sinfull flesh to satisfie the law, doth so expressly seuer him from the common estate of men, that he be vnder man without fault and corruption. But very childishly they trite it in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secret working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seed of Marie, then is not the womans seed, but onely the mens seed vnclene. For we do not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that he is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because he

he is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and uncorrupted, such as should have been before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained steadfastly determined with vs, that so oft as the Scripture putteth vs in mind of the cleanness of Christ, it is ment of his true nature of manhood: because it were superfluous to say that God is cleane. Also the sanctification that hee speakes of in the seventeenth of John, could have no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man is not unclean nor visitous of it selfe, but accidentall by his falling. Therefore it is no matter, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocencie was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this upon vs for an absurditie, that if the Worde of God did put on flesh, then it was inclosed in a narrow prison of an earthly body: this is but meer waiwardnesse: because although the infinite essence of the worde did growe together into one person with the nature of man: yet do we finde no inclosing of it. For the sonne of God descended maruellously from heaven, so as yet he left not heaven, it was his will to be maruellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conuertant in earth, and hang upon the cross, yet that he alway filled the worlde euem as at the beginning.

The xiiiij. Chapter.

How the two natures of the Mediator doe make one person.

Now where it is said, that the Worde was made flesh: that is not so to be understanded, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusely mingled with flesh, but because he chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by visitation of person. For we do affirme the Godhead joyned and united to the manhood, that either of them have their whole property remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fit, whom we see to consist of two substances, whereas yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the property of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the bodie, nor the bodie the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be severally spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewise of the bodie that thing may be said, which can by no meanes agree with the soule: and that may be saide of the whole man, which can be but vnitly taken neither of the soule nor of the bodie severally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the bodie sometime to the soule: and yet he that confuseth them is but one man and not many. But such forms of speech doe signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two divers natures which doe make the same person. And so doe the Scriptures speake of Christ: sometime they give unto him those things that ought singularly to be referred to his manhood, and sometime those things that doe peculiarly belong to his Godhead, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and doe agree with neither of them severally. And this contoyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiousnesse expresse, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the olde authors called Communicating of properties.

Things in Scripture sometimes spoken of the person of Christ & agreeing... was I am was farre disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what caullation the erronious spirits do deprave this place; For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already for knowne the Redeemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the mindest of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguieth the day of his manifestation from his eternal essence, and of purpose pronometh vnto him selfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth above Abraham, he doth undoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keepe their being: and whereas he himselfe reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that he worked together with the Father those things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these and such like are peculiarly ascribed to the Godhead. But whereas he is called the servante of the Father: and whereas it is faile, that he grewe in age, wisedome and fauour with God and men: that he seeketh not his owne glorie: that he knoweth not the last day: that he speakes not of himselfe: that he doth not his owne will: where he is faile, that he was seene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in respect that he is God, neither can he increase in any thing, and he worketh all things for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choise of his owne will, and can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not featurall aferibe these things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them upon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediatour. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul faith, that God did by his owne bloud, purchaseth vnto him a Church: and the Lord of glory crucified. A gaine, where John faith, that the Word of life was felt. Truly God neither hath bloud, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But because he which was both very God and man, Christ being crucified, did shed his bloud for vs: those things that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, and yet not without reason given to his Godhead. A like example is, where John teacheth that God gave his soule for vs: therefore there also the property of the manhood is communicat with the other nature. Again, when Christ had being yet conuerfent in earth, that no man have ascended into heauen, but the soune of man that was in heauen: truly according to his manhood, and in the flesh that he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himselfe was both God & man, by reason of the vnitie of both natures, he gave to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most paltry of all do these places set forth the true substance of Christ, which do comprehend both natures togeth: of which sort there are very many in the Gospell of him. For that which is there read is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhood, but both together, that he hath receiue of his father power to forgive sinnes, to raise vp whom he will, to give righteousness, holinesse and salvation, to be made judge over the quicke and the dead, to be honoured even as the father is: Finally, that he is called the light of the world, the good shepheard, the only dore, the true Vine: For such prerogatives had the soune of God, when he was shewed in the flesh, which although he enjoyed with his father before the world was made, yet hee had them not in the same manner or the same respect, and which could not be giue to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the judgement ended, that yeeld vp the kingdom to God & the Father: Even the kingdom of the soune of God, which had no beginning, nor shall have any ending: but even as he lay hid vnder the bafenes of the flesh, & abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a seruante, and laying aside the port of majestie, he shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and having performed all such subjection, at length is crowned with honor and glory, & advanced to the highest dominion, that all knees shall bow before him: so shall he then yeelde up to his father both that name and crowne of glory, and whatsoever he had received of his father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpofe is power and dominion given him, but that the father should govern vs by his hande? In which sense it is also faide, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, till we may enjoy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excus'd, which while they took no heed to the person of the Mediator, have obscure the natural meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the Gospel of John, and have entangled themselves in many triftes. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right understanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shall reign till he come forth to judge the world, in so much as he sitteth to his father, according to the small measure of our weaknesse. But when we being made partakers of the heavenly glory, shall see God such as he is, then he having performed the office of Mediator, shall cease to be the embassadors of his father, and shall be contented with that glory which he enjoyed before the making of the world: and the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifies the mean degree betweene God and vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whom are all things, and one Lord, by whom are all things, even he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, until his divine majestie be to be seen face to face. From whom so farre is it off that any thing shall decay, by yeelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shall become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also cease to be the head of Christs because Christ godhead shall then shine of itself, whereas yet it is covered with a certaine veile.

4 And this obscuracion shall doe no small service to afoile many doubts, if the readers doe fitly apply it. For it is marvellous how much the unskilfull, yea some not utterly unlearned, are cumbred with such formes of speech, which they see spoken by Christ, which doe well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood, because they consider not that they doe agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediator. And it is alwayes easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they have a sober expofitor, to examine so great mysteries with such devout reverence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these famous and franticke spirits trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are so joyntly spoken of both natures, that they seuerally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, confiting of both natures, united, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true Sonne of God, even according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driven far away from vs, which when he went about rather to drawe in funder, then to distinguishe the nature, did by the meanse imagine a double Christ. Whereas wee see that the Scripture crieth out with loude voice against it, where both the name of the Sonne of God is given to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin her selfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madness of Eutyches, last while we go about to shew the vanity of percon, we destroy either nature. For we have already allledged so many testimonies, and there are euery where so many other to be allledged, where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood: as may stop the mouthes even of the most contentious. And a little hereafter I will adioine some testimonies to confute better that fained deuife, but at this present, one place shall content vs. Christ would not have called called his body a Temple, unless the godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Where-fore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the Synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon; forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lese pestilent a monster, Michael Servetus, which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a saine thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vncreat. And first he deneth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his Sadduce, that the distinction of the two natures being once ouerthrown, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole procede he travaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were only certaine shadowish figures in God, whereof the trueth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the sonne of God. And we in deed do confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable favour of God, vnlesse this dignitie were given him to be, and be called the only begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church fandeth stedfastly grounded, that he is counted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worlds, did by hypostatical union take vpon him the nature of man. Now the hypostatical union is called with the old fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was defiued to ouerthrowe the doting error of Nestorius, because he fained that the sonne of God did so dwelle in flesh, that yet he the time was not man. Servetus fandereth vs, that we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Word was alreadie the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing els, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurditty it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to Marie do secretly shew, That holy thing that shalbe borne of thee, shalbe called the sonne of God: as if he should have sayd, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the lawe, should now become famous and every where known abroad. Wherewith agreeeth that sayning of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely and with boldnesse to cry Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the old time alio accounted among the children of God? Yea, and bearing them bold vp to that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heavenly fatherhood is become more plainely known; therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a privilege to the kingdom of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be held, that God never was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their own wickednesse maketh hateful to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Servetus should gault, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined with himself, because our purpoce is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the blood of beasts: but because they could not in thee be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reasow to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose great dignity did not hang vpon the redemption to come: yet much it needes be, that the Sonne in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I will repeate it againe shortly, and add the same of mankind. Sith from at their first begin-nine both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was allway the head and the first begotten of all creatures, to have the first degree in all: I think I do rightly gather that he was also the Sonne of God before the creation of the world.
Cap. 14.

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so term it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also Sonne in respect of his nature of man. Servetus and other such fantaske men would have it, that Christ which appeared in the fleshe was the Sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Now let them answere me whether he be the Sonne according to both natures, and in respect of both. So indeed they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. We graunt in deede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption onely and grace, but the true and natural, and therefore on-ely Sonne, that by this mark he may be distincked from all other. For God vouchesfath to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and onely begotten Sonne, he giueth to Christ onely. How can he be the onely Sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which we have received by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truly and properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, and offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father vpon the croffe: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he faith, he was seperated out to preach the Gospel of God, which he had before promised of his Sonne, which was begotten of the seede of David according to his flesh, and declared the Sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the Sonne of David according to the flesh, should he feuerally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, un-lesse he meant to shew that this did hang upon some other thing, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he faith, that he suffered by the weake-nesse of the flesh, and rofe againe by the power of the Spirit, even so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs graunte, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the Sonne of David, so he hath that of his father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is another thing and severall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here and there sometimes the Sonne of God, and sometimes the Sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moued: but according to the common use of the Hebrue tongue he is called the Sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead and eternall essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Sonne of man. Again, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of David, was no otherwise declared the Sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Iewes, is God blest for euer. Now if in both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the Sonne of man, is not also the Sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

7 They doe in deede disorderfully enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, that God spared not his own Sonne, and where the Angel commanded, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the Sonne of the highest. But, least they should giuise in so fickle an objection, let them weigh with vs a little, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he that is conceiued is called the sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because John faith, that he bringeth them tidinges of the Word of life, which his hands have handled. Likewise that, which is read in the Prophet: Thou Bethleem in the land of Juda, art a litle one in thousands of Judas: Out of thee shall be born to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his coming forth from the beginning, from the days of eternity. How will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to follow such manner of reasoning? For I have protested, that we do not agree with Neftorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conioyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doeth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glaie, wherein to behilde the maruerss and singular favour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserve. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency even according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vitie of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures united into one person, be divers ways called the Sonne of God, than that he be according to divers respects, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the Sonne of Man. And no more doeth that other cauillation of Ser. vetus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is nowhere called the Sonne of God, but under a figure, because although the describing of him, then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already electely proved that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the word begotten of the eternall father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which he hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not beene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutual relation to the Sonne, by whose all kinred or fatherhood is reckoned in heaven and in earth: whereby it is easie to gather, that even in the time of the law and the Prophets, he was the Sonne of God, before that this name was commonly known in the Church. But if they strive only about the onely word, Solomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (faith he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorat, that with the contentious this telltowme will not be of sufficient force: neither do I much ground upon it, sauing that it is shewed that they do maliciously caull, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the olde writers with one mouth and consent have openly testified the same: for that their flamenshffe is no lesse worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred which dare obiect Irenacus and Tertullian against vs, both which do confesse that the Sonne of God was invisibell, which afterward appeard visible.

8 But although Servetius hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deues, which peraduenture the other would not allow: yet if ye preffe them hard, ye shall perceive that all they that do not acknowledge Christ to be the sonne of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceited in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Maniches in olde time did foolishly affirm, that man hath his soule (as it were) by deruination from God, because they made that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast hold of the name of Sonne, that they leave no difference betweene the natures, but babble disorderly that Christ being man is the Sonne of God, because according to his natures of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begettynge of Wisdome that Solomon speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhuode. It were Indeede profitable to confute the

the greater deities of Seruettius, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the end that the godly readers admonished by this example, may holde them selves within the compasse of soberness and modestie: sauing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I have already done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and even then he was before appointed to be man that shoule be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other worde of God but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begettynge of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature itselfe. In the meanesime he confoundeth the Spirit with the Worde, for that God distributed the invisible Word and the Spirit into flesh and soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begettynge, but he faith, that he which then was but a shadow with forme in forme, was at length begotten by the word, to which he assigneth the office of seed. Whereby it shall follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seede of the word of God. For although, he compound Christ of three whereat elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faineth that he is to the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall Godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And laffe he should seeme to strip Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is confusubstantiall with God, and that the Worde was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he cannot conceive Christ to be the Sonne of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Worde to nothing, and taketh from vs the sonne of David, that was promised to be the Redeemer. He oft repeated this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predestination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shineed with god in the three elements, which afterward appeared in the first light of the worlde, in the cloude and in the pillar of fire. Now how shamefully he sometime disagreeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that have their found wet may gather, that with the circumstances of this unclean doge the hope of saluation is utterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the godhead itselfe, it should cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our Redeemer, but he that begotten of the seed of Abraham and David, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And he wrongfully standeth upon the words of John, that the Worde was made flesh. For as they reft the error of Neftorius, so they nothing further this wicked invention, whereof Eusiches was author, for as much as the onely purpose of the Evangell was to defend the unitie of perfections in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That we may know, to what end Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought yse those three things are principally to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his kingdom, and his Priesthood.

Christ a Prophet, a King, and Priest, so to be acknowledged, not with a cold mentioning of those titles but with a right understanding of the end and use of them. The people

A V Forstine faith rightly, that although the Heretikes doe bragge of the name of Christ, yet they have not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deed. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the worlde, founde in their mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretence of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this faying of Paul may be well spoken of them, that they have not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde founde founde matter of salvation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be established, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three parts. For he is given both a Prophet, a King, and a Priest. Albeit, it were but small profit to knowe those names, without knowledge of the ende and use of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profit, where it is not knowne what each of these titles containeth in it. Wee haue faide before, how though God sendeth Prophets by continual course one after another, did never leave his people destitute of profitable doctrine, & such as was sufficient to salvation: that yet the minde of the godly had alwaye this persuasion, that full light of understanding was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, even to the Samaritans, who yet knew the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias commeth he shall teach vs all things. And the Jews had not rashly gathered this vpon presumptions in their minds: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleued. Notable among the other is that saying of Ezekeil: Beholde, I haue made him a wittesflfe to peoples, I haue given him to be a guide and Schoolemaister to peoples: even as in another place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counsell. After this manner the Apostle commend the perfection of the doctrine of the Gospell, after that he had said, that God in the olde time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diversely, and under manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloved Sonne.
But because it was the common office of the Prophets to kepe the Church in suspense, and to vphold it vntill the comming of the Mediator, therefore wee reade that in their scattering abroad, the faithfull complained that they were deprevied of that ordinarie benefit, saying: We see not our tokens: there is no prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to seale vp the vision and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecye, which is there spoken of, should be established in assured credit, but alio that the faithfull shoule learnie with contented minde to want the Prophets for a time, because the fulnisse and closing vp of all revelations was at hand.

2. Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we knowe that in the time of the lawe, as well the Prophets as Priests and kings were appointed with holy oyle. For which cause the renowned name of Messias was given to the promisde Mediator. But though in deed I confesse (as I haue also declared in another place,) that he was called Messias, by pecular consideration and respect of his kynsdome: yet the annointings in respect of the office of Prophet and of Priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Ezekeil, in these words. The spirit of the Lord Jehova vpon me. Therefore the Lord hath annointed me, that I should preach to the meke, shoulde bring health to the contrite in hart, shoulde declare deliuerance to captaines, shoulde publish the yere of good will, &c. We see that he was annointed with the Spiritu, to be the publishe and wittesflfe of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is seuered from other teachers that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that hee tooke not the appointing for himself alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole bodie, that in his continuall preaching of the Gospell, the vertue of the Spiritu should ioyne withall. But in the meantime this remaineth certaine, that by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an ende is made of all prophecies, so that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospell, doe patch any fornaine thing vnto it. For that voice which thundred from heauen, saying: This is Mas. 3.17. my beloved Sonne, heare him: hath advanc’d him by singular privilidge above the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is powred abroade from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Joel. Your children shall prophesie, and your Joel.2.18. daughters

doughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul faith, that he was given vs vsnto wisdom, and in another place, that in him are hid all the treasures of knowledge and understanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceive what he is, have comprehended the whole infiniteness of heavenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place, I have counted it precious to know nothing, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawful to passe beyond the simplicity of the Gospel. And henceunto tendeth the dignity of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might know that in the sum of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisdom.

3 Now come I to his kingdom, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spiritual. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it ferueth, and what it availeth vs, and the whole force and ertennitie thereof, and also the ertennitie which in Daniel the Angel doth attribute to the person of Christ, and againe the Angel in Luke dooth woorthily apply to the salvation of the people. But that is also double or of two sorts, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the church, the other is proper to every member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalm: I have once vowed by my holines to David, I will not lie, his seed shall abide for ever, his state shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be established as the Moone for ever, and a faithfull witness in heaven. Neither is it doubtfull, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his sonne an eternall gouernor and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophetic he can found no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediately after the death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignity of the kingdome fell away, and was to the dishonneur of the house of David conveyed over to a private man, and afterward by little and little was diminished, till at length it came to utter decay, with haene and shamefull destruction. And the same meaning hath that exclamacion of Esay: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he do pronounce that Christ shall remaine alue after death, that he ioyneth him with his members. Therefore so oft as we heare that Christ is armed with eternal power, let vs remember that the everlafting continuance of the Church is upheld by this support, to remaine full safe among the troublesome toffings, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grievous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when David scorneth the boldneffe of his enemies, that goe about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kings and peoples raged in vaine, because he that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assautes: he affurcth the godly of the continuall preperation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope well so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when he saith, in the person of God: Sitt at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstoole: he warneth vs, that howe mantle and strong enemies fouer doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to prevaile against that vnchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the worlde, may be able at any time to destroy the Church, which is grounded vpon the eternall state of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the speciall vs of euerie one, the very same eternall continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we fee, that whatsoever is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very faire. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this world. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spiritual, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pærce to the hope of a better life; and where as he is now defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full fruit of this grace. grace in the world to come.

4. That as we have said, the force and profit of the kingdom of Christ cannot otherwise be perceived by us, but when we know it to be spiritual and sufficient though it were but by this, that while we must live in warfare under the cross, during the whole course of our life, our estate is hard and miserable: what then should it profit us to be gathered together under the dominion of a heavenly king, vnlesse we were certain to enjoy the fruit thereof out of the state of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be known, that whatsoever felicity is promised us in Christ, it consists not in outward commodities, that we should lead a mercie and quiet life, flourish in wealth, be assured from all harms, and grow full of those delightful things; but that which is most desire: but that it wholly belongeth to the heavenly life. But as in the world the prosperous and desired state of the people is partly maintained by plenty of good things and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences, whereby it may be safe against outward violence: so Christ also doth enrich his with all things necessarie to eternal salvation of souls, and fortifies them with strength, by which they may stand unable against all assaults of principal enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs then for himselfe, and that both within and without that being furnished to farre as God knoweth to be expedient for us, with the gifts of the spirit, whereof we are naturally empaque, wee may by these first fruits perceive that we are truly joyned to god unto perfect blessed-ness. And then, that bearing vs Bolde vpou the power of the same spirit, we may not doubt that we shall alway have the victorie against the Diuell, the world, and cruel kind of hurtfull thing. To this purpose tendeth the anwser of Christ to the Pharifees, that because the kingdom of God is within vs, it shall not come with observation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same king, under whom the souveraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in some required him to shewe forth his signes. But he, because they (who other wise are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest upon worldly pomps, bidde them to enter into their owne confidences, because the kingdom of God is righteoufnesse, peace and joy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught what the kingdom of Christ Rom.14.17. is, not earthly vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subject to corruption, but spiritual: he lifteh vs vp to eternal life, that we may patientlie passe over this life in miseries, hunger, cold, contempt, reproches, and other griefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will never leave us destitute, but assur vs in our necessities, till having ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his maner of reigning, to communicate with vs all that he hath receiued of his father. Now whereas he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnisheth vs with beauty and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministr’d vnto vs all plentifull matter to glorifie upon, and also Bolde courage to fight without feare against the diuell, sinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteoufnesse, we may valiantly overcome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberallly filleth vs with his gifts, so we againe for our part, may bring forth fruite to his glory.

5. Therefore his kingly anointing is fet forth vnto vs, not done with oyle or ointments made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God because vpon him hath rested the spirit of weddom, understanding, counseil, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladness, wherewith the Psalmes reporteth that he was anointed about his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needie and hungry. For as it is alreadie said, he is not privately enriched for himselfe, but to poure his plentie vpon vs, being hungry and dry, For as it is said, that the father gaueth the spiritio to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all we should receive of his fulnes, and grace for grace. Out of which fountain thou mayest see how the father gave the spiritio to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all we should receive of his fulnes, and grace for grace. Out of which fountain floweth that liberall flowing, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is duely distributed To know the eternall kingdom of Christ is cannot profit us at all except we know it to be spiritual, and to consist of two parts, the enriching of his subjects with good things, and the forcible defending of them against the assaults of principal enemies; out of this our comfort floweth.
Cap. 15. Of the knowledge of distributed to the faithful, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I said sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdom of Christ consisteth in the spirit, not in earthly delights or pompes, and therefore we must forsake the world that we may be partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptism of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested upon him in the likeness of a dove. That the holy Ghost and his gifts are meant by the word Anointing, ought to seeme neither noueltie nor abfurditie. For we are none other way quickened, speciallly for so much as concerneth the heavenly life: there is no drop of hony force in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his place in Christ, that from thence the heavenly riches might largely flow out vnsto vs, whereof we are so needy. And whereas both the faithfull stand insensible by the strengt of their King, and also his spirituall riches plenteously flow out vnto them, they are not unworthily called Christians. But this eternitie whereas we have spoken, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then he shall yeeld vp the kingdom to God and the Father. Againe: the Sonne himselfe shall be made subject, that God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing else, but that in that same perfec glorie, the administration of the kingdom shall not be such as it is now. For the Father hath given all power to the Sonne, that by the Sonnes hand he may gouerne, cherish and sustaine vs, defende vs under his safegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a little time we are waiering abroad from God, Christ is the mean betweene God and vs, by little and little to bring vs to perfect coniounyn with God.

And truely, whereas he firsteth on the right hand of the Father, that is, as much in effet, as if he were called the Fathers deputie, vnnder whom is the whole power of his domination, because it is Gods will to rule and defend his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expounde it in the first chapter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hand of the Father, to be the head of the Church, which is his bodie. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in another place, that there is given him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Jesus all knees should bow, and all tongues confess that it is to the glory of God the Father. For enu in the same words also he firsteth out in the kingdom of Christ an order necessarie for our present weakeenesse. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God shall then be by himselfe the onely heade of the Church, because Christes office in defending of the Church, shall be fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, because his Father did set him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lords power by him. For though there be many Lordships in the world, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whom are all things and in whom, and one Lord Christ, by whom are all things and we by him sayeth Paul. Whereupon is rightlie gathered that he is the same God, which by the mouth of Esie affirmed himselfe to be the King and the Law maker of the Church. For though he do every where call all the power that hee hath, the benefite and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the perfonage of the Mediator, that defending from the boome and incomprehensible glory of the Father, he might approch his vnto vs. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with all content prepared to obey, and that with great cheefulnes we direct our obedi-ces to his commandment. For as he syneth the offices of King and Pastor toward them that willingly yeeldeth themselfes obedient: so on the other side, we heare that he beareth an yron scepter, to brake and brufe all the obstinat like potters vess: we heare also that he shall be the judge of nations, to cower the earth with dead corpes, and to overthrow the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples seene at this day: but the full proove thereof shall be at the laft judgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdom.

6 Concerning 6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the ende and vice of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spot, that should by his holiness reconcile vs to God. But because the just curse possesseth the entire, and God according to his office of Judge is bent against vs, it is necessary that some expiation be vndone, that he being a Priest may procure favour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behooved that he should come forth with a sacrifice. For in the Law it was not lawfull for the Priest to enter into the Sanctuary without blood, that the faithfull might know, that though there were a Priest become means for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made favourable to vs before that our sins were purged. Upon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, from the fourteenth Chapter almost to the end of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of Priesthood can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our giltiness, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemn oath of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a Priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principal point, which he knew to be the chiefly point whereupon our salvation hanged. For as it is faid, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, unless our filthiness being purged, the Priests doe sanctifie vs and obtaine grace for vs, from which the uncleanesse of our wicked doings and sinnes doth debarre vs. So doe we fee, that we must begin at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and proffite of his Priesthood may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that he is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine favour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely assistance to pray, but also quietnesse to godlye consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tenderness of God, and are certainly persuaded that it pleaseth him whatsoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the Law, God commanded sacrificces of beasts to be offerred to him: there was an other and a new order in Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed hoft, and the Priest: because there neither could be found any other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthy so great honor to offer vp to God his onely begotten Sonne. Now Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father favourable and mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the fellowship of so great an honor. For we that are defiled in our selves, yet being made Priests in him doe offer vp our selves, and all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heavenly sanctuary, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, may be acceptable and sweete finnelling in the fight of God. And thus farre doth that sayinge of Christ ex-tende: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, hauing his holines pownd vp vs, in as much as he hath offered vs with himselfe to his Father, we that otherwise do slinke before him, doe pleade him as pure and cleane, yea, and holy. Hereunto serueth the anointing of the sanctuary, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the comparison of contrarietie is to be noted betwenee this anointing, and that shadowise anointing that then was in vs: as if the Angell should haue said, that the shado-ues being driven away, there should be a cleare Priesthood in the person of Christ, And so much more deeteable is their invention, which not contented with the sacri-cifice of Christ, haue presumed to threfut in themselves to kill him: which is daylie enterprised among the Papits, where the Maffe is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvj. Chapter.

How Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase salvation for vs, Wherein is increased of his death, and Resurrection and his Ascending into Heauen.

A l that we have hitherto said of Christ, is to be directed to this matter, that being damned, dead, and lost in our sueles, we may seek for righteousness, deliverance, life and salvation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name under heaven given to men wherein they must be saved. Neither was the name of Jesus given him vnaudiously, or at chanceable adventure, or by the will of men, but brought from heaven by the Angel, the publisher of God's decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to save the people from their finnes, in which words that is to be noted, which we have touched in an other place, that the office of Redeemer was appointed him, that he should be our Saviour: but in the meantime our redemption should be but imperfect, unless he shoulde by continual proceedings connuey vs forward to the uttermost mark of salvation. Therefore, to soone as we tawne newes little from him, our salvation by little and little vanishe away, which wholly refteth in him: so that all they wilfully loose themselues of all grace, that reft not in him. And the admonition of Bernard is worthy to be reheard, that the name of Jesus is not only light, but also meat, yea & oyle also, without which all the meate of the soule is drye, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vnfauorlie. Finally, that it is hony in the mouth, melodie in the eare, and joyfulnesse in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputacon is vnfauorlie, but where this name foundeth. But here it beho ueth to weigh diligently how salvation is purchaced by him for vs: that we may not onely be persuaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the steadfast upholding of our faith, we may refuse all such things as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For sith no man can defend into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to secke a meane and way to appease him, which demandeth satisfaction: there is no common aifurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alway upon sinners, till they be loose from their guiltinesse: who, as he is a righteous judge, suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reveng e it.

2 But before we goe anie further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which preserved vs with his mercie, was our enemy vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For how could he have given vs in his onely begotten sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse he had alreadie before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vnloose this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enemie to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were severed from God, till they were received into a conjoyning by his body. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that we may the better understand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in express words, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and everlastinge death did rest upon vs, we would lesse acknowledge how miserable we should be without God's mercie, and would lesse regard the benefit of deliverance. As for example, If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserved, thou shouldest have suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath willinglie and of his owne free kindness kept thee in fauour, and not suffered thee to be estranged from him, hee hath so deluded thee from that perill: trulie hee will be moued with, and in some part feele how much he oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that hee was by faire estranged from God, the heire of wrath, subject to the curse of externeall death, excluded from all hope of salvation, a straunger from all blessing of God, the bondslave of Sathan, captive under the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordained unto already entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreat for him, that Christ tooke upon him and suffered the punishment which by the just judgement of God did hang over all sinners, that he hath purged with his blood those euils that made them hatefull to God, that by his expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the Father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betwenee God and men: that upon this bond is contained his good will toward them: that not be so much the more moued with thefe, as it is more blye represented out of how great misery he hath beene deliverd? In a summe: because our minde can neither desirously enough take hold of life in the mercie of God, nor receive it with such thankfulness as we ought, but when it is before stricken and throwne downe with the fear of the wrath God and dread of eternal death, we are taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ we may see God in manner wrathfullly bent against vs, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that we may embrace his good will and fatherly kindness no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weaknesses of our capacitie, yet it is not falsely said. For God which is the highest righteousnesse, cannot leave wickednesse which he seeth in vs all. Therefore wee all haue in us that, which is woord the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truely we are all in displeasure of God, grieved in his fight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not loole that which is his in vs, he findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue. For howsoever we be sinners by our owne fault, yet we remaine his creatures. Howsoever we have purchased death to our selues, yet he made vs vnto life. So is he moued by meere and free louing of vs to receive vs into favour. But if there is a perpetuall and vnappeable disaigreement betwenee rightouesnesse and iniquitie, so long as we remaine sinners, he cannot receive vs wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disaigreement, he might wholly reconcile vs vnto him, he doth by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoever euill is in vs, that we, which before were vnwhite and vpyrue, may now appear righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doth with his loue prouent and goe before our recompence in Christ, yea, because he first loued vs, therefore he afterward doth reconcile vs vnto his selue. But because vnall Christ with his death come to us corvs, there remaineth wickednesse in vs, which deserveth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore we are not fully and intimately inuoyed to God, vnall Christ doe inuoye vs. Therefore if we will affirme our selues to haue God made well pleased and favouruable vnto vs, we must fasten our eyes and minde vpon Christ onely: as indeed we obtaine by him onely, that our sinnes be not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paul saith, that the same loue, wherewith God embraced vs before the creation of the world, was stayed and grounded vpon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the Scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture to accord very well together, where it is said: that God declared his loue toward vs in this, that hee gave his only begotten Sonne to death: and yet that he was our enemie till he was made favouruable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly prooved to them that require the Testament of the olde Church! I will alldgge one place of Augustines, where he teacheth the very same that we doe. The loue of God (faith hee) is incomprehensible and vunchangeable. For hee beganne not to loue vs, since the time that we were reconciled to him by the blood of his Sonne. But before the making of the worlde hee loued vs, even before that we were any thing at all, that wee might also be his children with with his only begotten Son. Therefore whereas we are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the Son did therefore reconcile us unto him, that he might now beginne to love us whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that alreadie loved us, to whom we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I say, let the Apostle bear witnesse. He doth commend ( faith he ) his love toward vs, because when we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. He therefore had a love to us, even then when we were enemies to him and wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a maruellous and divine manner he loved vs, even then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednes had on euerie side wafted away his worke, he knewe how in euerie one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to love that which he had made. Thefe be the words of Augustine.

5 Now where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betweene vs and God, and purchased such rightruefulness as might make him favourable and well willing toward vs: it may be generally answered, that he hath brought it to passe by the whole course of his obedience. Which is proued by the testimonie of Paul. As by one mans offence many were made sinners, so by one mans obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth the cause of the pardon that deliuereth vs from the curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ, saying, When the fulnes of time was come, God sent his Son made of a woman, Subject to the law, to redeeme them that were vnder the law: And so affirmed that in his very baptism was fulfilled one part of rightruefulness, that he obediently did the commandement of his father. Finally, from the time that he tooke vp on him the person of a seruant, he began to pay the ransome to redeeme vs. But the scripture to set out the manner of our salvation more certainly, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. He himselfe pronounced that he gave his life to be a redemption for many. Paul teacht that he died for our sins. John Baptist cried out that Christ came to take away the sins of the world, because he was the Lamb of God. In another place Paul faith, that we are justified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his own blood. Againe, that we are justified in his blood & reconciled by his death. Againe, he that know not sin, was made sin for vs, that we might be the rightruefulness of God in him. I will not recite all the the testimonies, because the number would be infinit, and many of them must be hereafter alleagde in their order. Therefore in the summe of beleefe, which they call the Apostles creed, it is verie orderly passeth immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he perfomred in his life: As Paul comprehended it wholly from the beginning to the end in sayings, that he abased himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient to his father to death, euere the death of the cross. And truely euery in the fame death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, verie it had been willingly offered, had nothing profited toward rightruefulness. Therefore, where the Lord testified, that he gave his soule for his sheepe, he expressly addeth this, no man take it away from my serf. According to the which meaning, Estae faith, that he held his peace like a lambe before the shearer. And the historie of the Gospel rehearseth, that he went forth and met the fouldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeeld himselfe to judgement to be pronounced upon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities upon him, and it behooned that his obedience to his father, should be this way tryed. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable love toward vs, to wrestle with horrible feare, and in the midst of these cruel tormentes to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might provide for vs. And this is to be beleued, that there could could no sacrifice be well offer'd to God any other wise, but by this that Christ for faking all his own affection, did submit & wholly yield himselfe to his fathers wil. For prove whereof, the apostle doth fully allege that testimonie of the Psalm in the book of the lawe it is written of me, that I may do thy wil, O God, I will, & thy law is in the midst of my hart. Then I said: Lo, I come. But because trembling confidences finde no rest but in a sacrifice and wafting whereby sinnes are cleaffed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltineffe, curfe was due unto vs, before the heavenly judgement seat of God, therefore first of all is recited how he was condemned before Ponce Pilate president of Iurie: that we should know that the punishment whereunto we were subject, was justly lade upon vs. We could not escape the dreadful judgement of God: Christ, to deliver vs from it, suffred himselfe to be condemned before a mortall man, yea a wicked and heathen man.
For the name of the presidet is expressed not only to procure credite to the histo-rie, but that we should learner that which Esay teacheth, that that chaffement of our peace was upon him, and that by his stripes we are healed. For to take away our damnation, every kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speeiall kinde of death was to be chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltineffe upon himselfe, he might deliuer vs from them both. If he had beene murthred by the enes, or had beene rashingly flaine in a commotion of the common people: in such a death there should have beene no apparence of satisfaction. But when he was brought to be arraigned before the judgement seat, when hee was accused and prifled with witneffes against him, and was by the mouth of the judge condemned to die: by these tokens we understand, that he did bare the person of a guiltie man and of an euill doctor. And here are two things to be noted, which both were aforespoken by the prophecies of the Prophets, and do bring a singular comfort and confirmation of Faith. For when we heare that Christ was sent from the judges seat to death, and was hanged among the enes, we have the fulfilling of that prophacie, which is allledged by the Evangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so?
euen to take upon him the deed of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because he suffred death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we heare that he was acquitted by the same mouth whereby he was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more then once to beare witneffe of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other prophet: that hee re-payed that which he had not taken away. And so we shall beholde the person of a sinner and euill docter represented in Christ: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence then his owne. He suffred therefore under Ponce Pilate, and so by the Solemn sentence of the President, was reckoned in the number of wicked doecers: but yet not so, but that he by the same judge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he found no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittal, that the guiltineffe which made vs subject to punishment, is removed upon the head of the Sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, we ought principally to holde fast, lest we tremble and be careful all our life long, as though the just vengeence of God did hang over vs, which the foame of God hath taken upon himselfe.

6 Beside that, the verie manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie.
The Cross was accused, not onely, by opinion of men, but also by decree of the law of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Croffe, he made him himselfe subject to the curfe. And so it behooved to be done, that when the curfe was re-mooned from vs to him, we might be delivered from all curfe that for our sinnes was prepared.

prepared for vs, or rather did already rest upon vs. Which thing was also by shadow expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offered for sinnes, were called Atonement. Which words properly signifieth sinne in itself. By which figurative change of name, the holy Ghost ment to shew, that they were like unto cleansing plasters to draw out to themselues, and bear the curse due to sinne. But that name which was figuratively represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is indeed declared in Christ the original patterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gave his owne soule to be an atonement, or a satisfactorie oblation, as the prophet calleth it, upon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so ceaze to be imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainly, where he teacheth, that he which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that wee might bee made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the sinner of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put upon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side couered vs with his cleanenesse. It seemeth that he meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remoued, and laide upon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered vp to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, wee might ceaze to dread the wrath of God. Nowe is it plain, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs all were laide upon him, that is, that he extendeth to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enter-changed imputation, couered with them. Of this, the crosse wherunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (as faith hee) redeemed vs from the curse of the lawe, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is euery one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where he teacheth that Christ did beeare our sinnes vpon the tree. Because by the very token of the crosse we doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laide vpon him. And yet it is not so to be understood, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, where-with himselfe was our diodel, but rather that in taking it vpon him, hee did tread downe, brake and destroy the whole force of it in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doth not without a cause honourable report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Charriot of triumph. For he faith, that the hand writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the princely powers were spoiled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternall spirit. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take fluted roote, and be thoroughly settled in our harts, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For we could not certainly believe that Christ was the ransom, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse hee had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therefore there is so often mention made of bloud, where the Scripture sheweth the manner of our redeeming. Albeit the bloud of Christ, that was shed, fumeed not onely for sacrifice, but also in stead of washing, to cleanse away our filthinesse.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where againe it is to be seen, how he did everywhere put himselfe in our stead, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held vs bound vnder his yoke. Christ in our stead did yeeld himself into the power of death, to delilter vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs.
But in this he differed from vs, that he gave himselfe to death, as it were to be devoured, not that he should be swallowed up with the gulfes of it, but rather that he should swallow vp it, of which we should have bene preiently swallowed; that he gave himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he should overthawe death which approached neere vs, yea, and Heb. 2. 19. had already beaten vs downe and triumphed upon vs. Finally, that by death hee might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Duell, and might deliver them that by feare of death were all their life long subjects to bondage. This is the firft fruites that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterprising of himselfe with vs, he mortifieth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter vs their owne works: and killeth our old man, that is but no more lust and beare fruites. And to the same purpose perteneth his burial, that wee being partakers thereof, should also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle teacheth that wee are graffed into the likeness of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his croffe the world was crucified to vs, and we to the world, that we are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhort vs to express the example of Col. 3. 3. Christes death, but he declareth that there is such effectual necesse in it, as ought to appeare in all Christians, vnselsthey will make his death vnprofitable and fruitlesse. Therefore in the death and burial of Christ, there is offered vs a double benefit to be enjoyed, that is deliverance from death, wherunto we were become bond, and the mortifying of our flesh.

3 But it is not meete to overpass his going downe to the helles, wherein is no small importance to the effet of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the old fathers, that that part which is read in the Creede was not in old time so much vsed in the Churches; yet in entreaty of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a very profitable, and not to be despised mysterie of a right weightie matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that do not leave it out. Whereby we may seethe, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by little and little growe in vfe in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common judgement of all the godlie: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe, to the hells, although after divers manner of exposition. But by whom, or at what time it was first added, makes little to the purpose. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heede unto, that we therein certainly have a full and in all pointes perfect summe of our faith, wherein nothing may be trespas, but that which is taken out of the most pure word of God. Now, if any wil not for present easie conscience admit it into the Creede, yet shall it straight way bee made to appeare plainly, that it is of so great importance to the summe of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is lost a great part of the fruite of the death of Christ. There are againe some that thinke, that there is no newe thing spoken in this article, but that in other words the same thing is repeated which was spoken before of his burial: for as much as the word Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture often times vsed for the grave. I grant that to bee true, which they allledge of the signification of the word, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the grave, but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily persuaded to dissent from them. For what an idlenes were it, when a thing so hard to understande, hath once bene set out in plaine and easie wordes, afterward with darker implication of wordes, rather to point towards it than to declare it. For when two manners of speaking that express one thing be joyned together, it becometh that the latter be an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should say thus: Whereas it is saide that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell. Again, it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition could Cap. 16. Of the knowledge of could have crept into this abridgement, wherein the chief points of our faith are summarily noted in as few words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall have somewhat diligently eyed the matter it selfe will easily agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the lawe, to carrie them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliver them out of prison wherein they were kept inclosed; and to the proofs whereof they doe wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalm, that he brake the brazen gates and yron barres. Againie, out of Zachariah, that he redeemed them that were bound, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalm speaketh of their deliverances that in farre countries are cast captiue into bonds, and Zachariah comprehendeth the Babylonical overthrow, wherein the people was oppressed, to a drie pit or bottomlesse depth, and therewithall teacheth that the salvation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepes hells: I wot not how it is come to passe; that they which came after, though that there was a certaine place under the earth whereunto they have faine the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day men doe earnestly defend it for a truth: is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to inclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what needeth it that Christes soule should go downe thither to set them at libertie? I do in deed willingly confess, that Christ suffered them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely tasted of by hope, was then delivered to the world. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he saith, that Christ came and preached to the spirits that were in a dungeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very proceede of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth thereby magnifie the force of Christes death, for that it peered euery one to the dead, when the godly soules enjoyed the present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all salvation. But whereas Peter in his laying maketh no distingution betweene them, that is not to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but onely he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

10 But concerning Christes going downe to the hells, beside the consideration of the Creede, we must secke for a more certaine exposition, and we assuredly have such a one out of the worde of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death hath bene to no effect, if he had suffered onely a corporall death: but it behooved also that he shoulde seele the rigour of Gods vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath and satisfie his just judgement. For which cause also it behooved that he should as it were hand to hand wrangle with the armies of the hells and the horror of eternall death. We haue even now alleged out of the Prophete that the chastisement of our peace was laide vpon him: that he was striken of his father for our sinnnes, and bruised for our iniquitie. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the stead of wicked doers, as surety and pledge, yea, and as the very guiltie person himselfe, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should haue bene laide vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden full of the forrowes of death. Therefore it is no maruell if it be saide that he went downe to the hells, for he suffered that death wherewith God in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is perturbed, because it were an absurdistie to set that after his burial which went before it. For after the setting forth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that inuincible and incomprehensible judgement which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should know that not not only the body of Christ was given to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater and more excellent price paid in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible torments of a damned and forsaken man.

11 According to this meaning, doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe having loosed the sorowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or overcome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresseth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the sorowes of death, which proceeded from the curse and wrath of God, which is the original of death. For how small a matter had it bin, carelesly and as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true profe of his infinite mercie, not to shun that death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrues, where he wreteth: that Christ was heard of his owne Feare: some translate it Reverence or pietie, but how vnfruitly, both the matter it selfe, and the verie maner of speaking proueth, Christ therefore praying with teares and mightie cry, is heard of his own selfe: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place he had put our perfon vp on him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomles depth then for a man to feele himselfe forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vp on him, even as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Even this therewith wee see that Christ was thrown downe, so farre that by enforcement of diftreffe he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whatsoever some would have it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselfe: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is evident, that this saying proceeded out of the verie anguih of the botome of his heart. Yet do we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemie or angrie with him. For how could he be angry with his beloved sonne, upon whom his minde rested? Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himself? But this is our meaning: that he suffred the grievouenes of Gods rigor, for that he being striken and tormented with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of God when he is angrie and punisht. Whereupon Hillarie argueth thus, that by this going downe we have obtained this, that death is faine. And in other places he agreeeth with our judgement, as where saith: The cross, death, and hell are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of God is in the hells, but man is carried vp to heaven. But why do I alledge the testimonie of a private man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruit of his victorie, that they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their lifting subject to bondage? It howbeit therefore, that he should overcome that feare, that naturally doeth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his feare was no common feare or conceived upon a sudden cause, shall by and by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the dierell, with the horror of death, with the pains of the hells, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed over them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some lawd men, although vnlerned, yet rather moud by malice than by ignorance, crieth out that I do a hamanous wrong to Christ, because it was against conveniency of reason, that he should be fearefull for the saluation of his soule, and then they more hardly enforce this ca蜜ation, with saying, that I offende to the sonne of God deperation, which is contrarie to faith. First they do but maliciously more controversie of Christs feare and trembling, which the Evangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirit and passionate with heauines, and at his verie meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfaire, that is...

too soule a thist. We must therefore as Ambrose truely teacheth, boldly confesse the sorrowfulnesse of Christ, vnles we be ashamed of his croffe. And truely, if his soule had not bee paraker of paine, he had bee onely a redeemer for bodies. But it be- hooned that he should wretche, to raise vp them that lay throwen downe. And his heavenly glory is so nothing impaired thereby, that euen herein gloriously fineth his goodnes which is never sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weak- nesse vpon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorrowes, which the Apostle setteth before vs: that this Mediator did seeke our infirmities,that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in miseries. They say: that that thing which is evil of it selfe, is vnworthyly ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirit of God, which joyneth these two things together, that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakness of Christ should make vs afraide, whereunto he was not by violence or necellitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercie was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoever hee of his owne will suffered for vs, diminished nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backbiters deci- ded, that they doe not perceive in Christ an infirmity cleane and free from all fault and spot, because hee kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience. For whereas there can be founde no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affections doe with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they doe wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his uncorrupted state, there was a moderation having force in all his affections, to restraine exceffe. Where- by it might well be that he was like vnto vs in sorrowe, dread, and fearfulness, and yet that by this marque he differed from vs. Being so confused, they leape to another cauli- lation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse and wrath of God from which he knew himselfe to be safe. But let the godly readers wry how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more fearfull than the most part of the very rascal sort of men. Theeues and other euill doers doe obstinatly haftie to death, many doe with haunte courage despite it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it for the fonne of God to be astonifh- ed and in a maner striken dead with feare of it? For euen that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemency of grieues, very drops of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shewe to the eyes of other, but when in a secret corner whither he was gone out of companie, he groaned vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needefull that he should have Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted manner of comforting. How shamefull a tenderness, as I said, should this have been, to bee so far tormentted for feare of common death, as to melt in bloudie sweate, and not to bee able to be comforted, but by fight of Angels? What? doth not that praiser thrist repeated, (Father if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitterness of hart, thow that Christ had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby appeareth that those triflers against whom I nowe dispute, doe boldly babble vpon things that they know not, because they never earnestly considered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we bee redeemed from the judgement of God. But this is our wisdome, well to understand how deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man shoule ask me, if Christ went then downe to hell, when he praied to escape that death: I answeare, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grecious and terrible torments hee suffered, when hee knew himselfe to stande to bee arraigned for our cause before the judgement state of God. But although for a moment of time, the divine power of the spirit did hide it selfe to give place to the weakness of the flesh: yet must we know, that the tentation by feeling of sorrow and feare Now was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the sermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the sorrow of death, because when he felt himselfe as if he were taken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue from the truit of his godnesse. Which is proved by that his notable calling upon God, when for extremities of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?
For though he was above measure grieved, yet he ceaseth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confuted as well the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monothelites. Apollinaris faid that Christ had an eternall spirit instead of a soule, so that he was only but halfe a man.
As though he could cleanse our soules any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is that affection or will of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we know was troubled for this purpose to drive away feare, and bring peace and quietness to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrarie affection. For herein is a plaine shew of contrariete. Father deliuer me from this house. But even herefore I came even into this house. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexite yet was there no such outrage in him as is scene in vs, even when we most of all endeauor to subdue our selues.

13 Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that we have hitherto were but vnperfect. For fith there appeareth in the croffe, death, and buriall of Christ nothing but weaknesse: faith must passe beyond all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although we have in his death a full accomplishment of suffocation, because by it both we are reconcilied to God, and his just judgement is satisfied, and the curfe taken away, and the penalty fully payed; yet we are faide to be regenerate into a living hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the verie resurrection: but how this is, is better expressed in the words of Paul. For he sayeth, that Christ dyed for our sinnes, and was raised vp againe for our justification: as if he should have saide, that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousness was renewed and restored.
For how could he by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselfe had lyen still overcome by death? How could he have gotten victorie for vs, if himselfe had beene vanquished in fight? wherefore we do so part the matter of our saluation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death we say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousness was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meanes of his resurrection, his death did shew forth her force and effeet vnto vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his verie resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vterred his heavenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and astedfast stay of our faith.
As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spiritt. And in the same meaning in an other, where he entertaineth of perfection, he faith: that I may know him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adiungeth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gave him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God; not that our faith being vpholden by his death should waver, but that the power of God which keepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shew it selfe in the resurrection.
Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death only, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it vnde secrecy-ally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertained.
pertaineth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtained the crown of conquest, so that there should be both resurrection and life: therefore Paul doth for good cause affirme that faith is destroyed, and the Gospell is become vaine and deceitfull, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in another place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrors of damnation, to amplify the same, he faith further: Yea, the same He which died, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediator for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that vpon the partaking of his croffe hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be understood, that by his resurrection we obtain another commoditie which answerseth that mortification: For (saith the Apostle) we are therefore grafted into the likeness of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this, that we are dead together with Christ, to prooue that we ought to mortifie our members vpon earth likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things that are above, and not those that are vpon the earth. By which wordes we are not onely exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newenes of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate into righteousness. We obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest delivered vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we know that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof the disputation more at large in the fiftene chapter of his Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is said, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the truth both of his death and of his resurrection: as if it had beene faide, that he did both die the same death that other men naturally doe die, and received immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

14 To his resurrection is not vnitly adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ began more fully to set foureth his glorie and power by rising againe, for that he had now laid away that base and vnworthy estate of mortall life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascending vp into heauen onely, he truely began his kingdom. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to full of all things. Where in seeming of repugnance he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had been penned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conversant in earth. And therefore John, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by faith, that the holy Ghost was not yet gone to the faithfull, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lorde himselfe also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not go away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But he gieneth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leave them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine manner, in deed invisibill, but yet more to be desired, because they were then taught by more assured experience, that the authorities which he enioineth, & the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not only to make them line blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then advanced his kingdome, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in overthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he tooke away the presence of his bodie out of our sight: not to ceaze to be present with the faithfull that yet wandred in the earth, but with more present power to governe both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the ende of the world, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his bodie was lifted vp above all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and and spread abroad beyond all the bounds of heaven and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines words than mine owne. Christ (faith he) was to goe by death to the right hande of the father, from whence he is to come to judge the quick and the dead; and that likewise in bodily presence according to the sounde doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirittual presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely and plainely: According to an unspakeable and inuible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you all the daies, even to the end of the world. But according to the flesh which the word tooke upon him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that he was taken of the Jewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken downe from the croffe, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laide in the graue, that he was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alwaye have me with you. Why so? because he was conquerant according to the presence of his bodie foute daies with his discipyles, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen and is not here, for he sitte there, at the right hand of his father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of majestie. Therefore according to the presence of his majestie, we alwaie haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truely said to his discipyles: but me ye shall not alwaye have. For the church had him a few daies according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but feeth him not with eies.

15 Wherefore, it by and by followed, that is sitten downe at the right hand of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that have theiritters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and gouerne in their fleede. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father will be exalted and reigne by his hand: was receiued to sit at his right hand: as if it had bin said, that he was inuited in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred upon the possession of the gouernment committed vnto him, and that he not only entred upon it, but also continueth in it till he come down to judgment. For so doth the Apostle expound it, when he faith thus: The father hath set him at his right hand, above all principaltie and power, and strength and dominion, and every name that is named not onely in this world, but in the world to come, &c. He hath put all things vnder his fete, and hath given him to be head of the Church above all things. Now you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heauenly and earthlie may with admiration look upon his majestie, be governed with his hand, behold his countenance, and be subject to his power. And the Apostles meane nothing els, when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therfore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednes is onely meant by it. And it forseth not, that in the Actes, Stephen testified that he saw him standing, because we speake not here of the gesture of his bodie, but of the majestie of his dominion: so that to sit is nothing els, but to be chiefe judge in the heauenly judgement fear.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit. For it leameth, that the Lord by his ascending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kongdom, which before had bene stopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our fleth as in our name, thereupon foloweth that which the Apostle faith, that we do alreadie in him after, a certaine manner sit in heauen. For that we doe not with bare hope looke for heauen, but alreadie in our head we posseffe it. Moreover faith perceueth that he fitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a fanctuarie not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father a continuall advocate and intercessour for vs. he so turneth the fathers eies to his rightcouny, that he turneth them a way from our sinnes: he so reconcileth his minde vnto vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs away and passage to his throne, filling it with grace and mercifualnes, which otherwise would haue bin full of horror to wretched sinners.
Thirdly, faith conceiveth his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, wealth, and glorying against the hells. For ascending into heaven he led captiuities captive, & spoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with heaps of spiritual riches. He setteth therefore on high, that from hence pouring out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a spiritual life, sanctifie with his spirit, and garnish his Church with the dyes gifts of his grace, preferre it life against all harts by his protection, restrain with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crost, and of our salvation: finally, hold all power, both in heaven and in earth, till he have overthrown all his enemies which are also our enemies, and made perfect the building vp of his Church. And this is the true rate of his kingdom: this is the power that his father hath given him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to judge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doth in deed here shew to them that be his, plaine prooves of his power present among them: but because under the bafenes of fieth his kingdom, doth in a manner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke vpon that visible presence, which he will openly shew at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come down from heaven, even such as he was seen to go vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnspeakable majestie of his kingdom, with bright glistening of immortalitie, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our redeemer at that day, when he shall seuer the lambs from the goats, the chosen from forfaken: and there shall be none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his judgement. For from the fiirthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trumpet, whereof all shall be summoned to his judgement seat, both they that shall be found alio at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there be that in this place expound the wordes of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the old writers did sticke in doubt vpon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaid meaning is plain and easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creed which is evident that it was written according to the capacity of the common people. And herewith nothing disagree thre that which the Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at the last judgement shall not die after a natural manner and order: yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shall be like a death, is not unproperly called death. It is indeed certaine, that not all shall sleep, but all shall be changed. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortal life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vitally transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can deny to be a death: and yet in the meanes time it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shall be summoned to the judgement: because the dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they that shall remaine and be living, shall with them be solemnly taken vp into the aire to meet the Lord. And truly it is likly that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemn prectification of Paul to Timothie.

18 Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is judge, which hath alreadie appointed vs partners with him in judging: so far is it off, that he will go vp into the judgement seat to condemn vs. For how should the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? how should the head scatter abroad his owne members? how should the patrones condemn his owne clients? For if the Apostle declareth out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come forth that can condemn vs: it is much true, that Christ himselfe beeting our intercessour, will not condemn them whom he hath received into his charge and tuition. It is truly no small assurance, that we shall be brought before no other judgement seat, but of our owne redeemer, from whom our salvation is to be looked for:
moreover that he which nowe by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sitting in judgement performe his promise. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the Sonne, in giving him all judgement, that so he hath prouided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the judgement. Hitherto I haue followed the order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in few worde conteneth the chiefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a Table, wherein we do diffincely and severally see those things that are in Christ woorthie to be taken heed vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the authours of it. It is truly by great content of the old writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common travel written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they judged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, delivered by the hands of the Apostles, was woorthie to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whence soever it proceeded at the first, it hath curen from the first beginning of the Church, and from the very time of the Apostles, beene vse as a publique confession, and receiued by content of all men. And it is likely that it was not privately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is evident that curen from the farthest age it hath alway continued of sacred authoritie and credite among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to be cared for, we haue wholly out of controuersie, that the whole historie of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing contained in it that is not sealed with sound testimonies of Scripture. Which being understood, it is to no purpose either curiously to doubt, or to trie with any man who were the author of it; vnderlie perhaps it be not enough for some man to be assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but if he do alio understand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hand it was written.

19 But forasmuch as wee doe see, that the whole summe of our salvation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, wee must beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any part thereof bee it never so little. If wee seeke for salvation, wee are taught by the very name of Jesus, that it is in him, if wee seeke for any other gifts of the Spreteth, they are to bee founde in his anointing, if wee seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if wee seeke for cleanliness, it is in his conception: if wee seeke for tender kindnesse, it sheweth it selfe in his birth, whereby hee was made in all things like unto vs, that hee might learne to forowe with vs: if wee seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if wee seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if wee seeke for releafe of the curse, it is in his croffe: if wee seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifce: if wee seeke for cleansing, it is in his bloud: if wee seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the helles: if wee seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his buriall: if wee seeke for neyenesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if wee seeke for immortaltie, it is in the same: if wee seeke for the inheritance of the kyndome of heaven, it is in his entrance into heaven: if wee seeke for defense, for all yedenesse, for plentie and floure of all good things, it is in his kyndome: if wee seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the judgment, it is in the power given to him to judge. Finallie, if the treasures of all sorte of good things are in him, let vs drawe thence and from no where else, even till wee bee full withall. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diverse hopes, although they haue principall regarde to him, yet curen in this they are out of the right waye, that they turne any parte of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust cannot crepe in, where the abundance of his good gifts hath once beenewell known.
His question is also to be answered for an addition. For there are some flittle men after a wrong manner, which although they confefle that we obtain salvation by Christ, yet cannot abide to heare the name of deferuing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will have Christ to be only the in-strument, or minister, not the Author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deed I confefle, that if a man will let Christ simply and by himselfe against the judgement of God, then there shall be no room for deferuing: because there can not be found in man any worthinesse that may deferue the fauour of God. But, as Augustine most truely wrieth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Saviour himselfe, the man Christ Jesus, which hath obtained to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deferuing of workes or of faith going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that fame Man deferued to be taken vp by the Word that is coeternall with the father into one person, and so to be the only begotten Son of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom according to the meafure of euerie one, it floweth abroad into all his members. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made a Chriflian, by which that fame man from his beginning was made Chrift. Againe in another place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediator himselfe. For he that made of the feede of David a man righteous that never should be unrighteous, without any deferuing of his will going before, even the fame he doth of vngighteous make them righteous that are the members of that head: and fo forth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Chriftes deferuing, we doe not fay that in him is the beginning of deferuing, but we clime vp to the ordinance of God, which is the first caufe thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediator, to purchase salvation for vs. And fo is the deferuing of Chrift vniuely fet against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one under another do not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans justification is free by the meere mercy of God, and that there also the de-leruing of Chrift come betwene which is contained under the mercy of God. But against our workes are aptly fet, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Chrift, either of them in their degree. For Chrift could not de-ferue any thing but by the good pleafure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpofe, with his Sacrifice to appeafe the wrath of God; and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a fumme: because the deferuing of Chrift hangeth upon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of salvation, therefore as well the fame deferuing as that grace, is fiuely fet against all the workes of men.

2 This diffinition is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God fo lovd the world, that he gave his onely begotten Sonne, that whofoever beleueth in him shall not perish. We fee how the loue of God holdeth the ftrke place, as the fo-ureaigne caufe or originally, and then followeth faith in Chrift, as the fefcond or neere-caufe. If any man take exception and fay, that Chrift is but the formal caufe, he doth more diminish his power than the words may beare. For if we obtaine righteoufneses by faith that refleth upon him, then is the matter of our fauation to be fough in him, which is in many places plainly proued. Nor that we first loved him, but he first loved vs, and lent his Sonne to be the appeaing for our finnes. In these words is clearely shewed, that God to the end that nothing shoule withf tand his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Chrift. And this word Appeaing, is of great weight: because God, after a certaine unspakeable manner, euen the same time that he loved vs, was also angry with vs, vntill he was reconciled in Chrift. And to this purpose fere all thofe fayings: He is the fatisfacon for our finnes. Againe: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the Croffe by him, &c. Againe, God was in Chrift, reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their finnes. Againe, he accepted vs in his beloved Sonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the Croffe. The reafon of this mercy is to be fetched out of the firth Ch"pter to the Ephefians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were choften in Chrift, ad-deth therewithall, that we have obtained favour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his favour them whom he loved before the making of the world, but because he vtered his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Chrift? For fith God is the fountain of all righteousnes, it muft needs be, that man fo long as he is a finner, haue God his enemy and his Judge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousnes, fuch as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no finne, to be finne for vs, that we might be the righteousnes of God in him. For he meanteth, that we have obtained free righteousnes by that facrifice of Chrift, that we should please God, which by naure are the children of wrath and by finne estranged from him. But this diſtinction is also meant fo oft as the grace of Chrift is ioyned to the loue of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giueth vs of his owne that which he hath purchafed: for otherwife it would not agree with him, that this praise is giuen him fecretly from his Father, that it is his grace and procedeth from him.

3 But it is truely and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Chrift by his obedience hath purchased us favour with his Father. For this I take for a thing confefled, that if Chrift hath fatisfied for our finnes, if he hath fuffered the punishment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, finally, if he being righteous, hath fuffered for the vni righteous, then is faluation purchased for vs by his righteousnes: which is as much in effect as to delerue it. But, as Paul witneffeth, we are reconciled and have received reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hatefull by reafon of finne, is by the death of his Sonne appeased, so that he might be favourable vnto vs. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be noted, as by the tranfgression of one man, many were made finners: fo alfo by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the finne of Adam we were estranged from God and ordained to deítruction, fo by the obedience of Chrift we are receiued into faviour as righteous. And the future time of the verbe doth not exclude prefent righteousnes, as appeareth by the procffe of the text: For he had faid before, that the free gift was of many finnes vnto justification.

4 But when we fay, that grace is purchafed vs by the deferuing of Chrift, we meane this, that we are cleaned by his blood, and that his death was a satisfaction for our finnes. His blood cleanseth vs from sinne. This blood is it that is shed for remifion of sinne. If this be the effect of his bloodshed, that finnes be not imputed vnto vs: it followeth, that it is that price the judgement of God is fatisfied. To which purpofe furelth that faying of John the Baptist: Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the finne of the world. For he feteth in comparison Chrift against all the sacrifices of the Law, to teache that in him onely was fulfilled that which those figures shewed. And we know, what Moses ech where faith: Iniquitie shall be cleaned, finne shall be put away and forgiven. Finally we are very wel taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Chrift: And this point the Apostle feteth out in the Epiftle to the Hebrewes, very fiily taking this principle, that remifion is not wrought without shedding of blood. Whereupon he gathereth, that Chrift for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Againe: that he was offered vp to take away the sinnes of many. And he had faid before, that not by the blood of goates or of calves, but by his owne blood he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reasoneth: If the blood of a calf do sanctifie according to the cleannesse of the flesh, that much more consciences are cleansed by the blood of Christ from dead works: it easely appearreth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, yndele we grant vnto his sacrifiie the power of cleansing, appeasing and satisfying. As a litle after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new testament, that they which are called, may receive the promise of eternall inheritance by mean of death for the redemption of sinnes going before, which remained vnder the law. But specially it is convenient to wye the relation which Paul describeth, that he became a curfe for vs &c. For it were superfluous, yea and an absurditie, that Christ shoule be charged with curfe, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, should purchase righteousnes for them. Also the testimonie of Esay is plaine, that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon Christ, and that we obtained health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our sinnes, it could not have bene saide, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the paine whereunto we were subiect. Wherewith agreeeth that which followeth in the same place: For the sinne of my people I haue striken him. Let vs also recite the exposition of Peter, which shal leaue nothing doubfull: that he did beare our sinne vpon the tree. For he faith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were delivred, was laid vpon Christ.

And the Apostles do plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ransome to redeeme vs from the guiltines of death. Being justified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whom God hath set to be the propitiatory by faith which is in his bloud. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, because he hath giuen the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his bloud, that haung obtained righteousness, we may stand boldly before the judgement of God. And to the same effect is that sayinge of Peter: that we are redeemed not by golde and siluer, but by the precious bloud of the anointed Lambe. For the compaign also would not agree, yndele with that price satisfaction had bin made for sinnes: for which reason Paul faith that we are precious bought. Alfo that other sayinge of his would not stand together. There is one mediator that gave him selfe to be a redemption, yndele the paine he had bene caft vpon him which we had deferved: Therefore the fame Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the bloud of Christ is the fguiuenesse of sinnes: as if he shoulde haue saide, that we are justifie or acquited befoe God, because that bloud aunswereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeeth the other place, that the hand-writting which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant the payment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. There is also great weight in these wordes of Paul: If wee be justified by the worke of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For hereby wee gather, that wee must fetch from Christ that which the lawe would give, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtayne by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our worke in the lawe when he saide: He that doeth these things, shall live in them. Which he no lesse plainely confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleewing in Christ we are justified from all those things, from which we could not be justified in the lawe of Mosaes. For if the keeping of the lawe be righteousnesse, who can deny that Christ declared favour for vs, when taking that burden vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if wee our selves had kept the lawe? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward writeth to the Galatians: God sent his sinne subiect to the lawe, that he might redeeme those that were vnder the lawe. For to what end served that that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteousness, taking upon him to make good that which we were not able to pay. Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousness without works, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousness is reckoned to vs which was found in Christ onely. And truly for no other cause is the death of Christ called our meate, but because we find in him the substance of life. And that power proceeded from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousness. As Paul faith, that he gave himself a sacrifice of sweete favour. And in another place: He died for our sins, he rose againe for our justification. Hereupon is gathered, that not onely salvation is given vs by Christ, but also that for his sake his Father is now favourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt but that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esay saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for David my seruants sake. Whereof the Aposlle is a right good witness, where he faith: Your sinnnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet John after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronounce He. In which sentence also the Lord pronounceth. As I liue because of my Father, so shall ye also liue because of me. Wherewith agreeth that which Paul faith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to beleue in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demand, whether Christ suffered for himselfe, (as Lombard, and the other Schoolemen doe) is no lesse foolish curiousitie, than it is a rash determination when they affirm it. For what needed the Sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for himselfe? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, did put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the Father provided for the commoditie of his Sonne in his sufferings, but that he deliuered him to death, and spared him not, because he loued the world. And the Prophets manners of speaking are to be noted, as, A Child is borne to vs. Againe: Rejoyce thou daughter of Zion: behold thy King commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of loue should be very cold, which Paul leteth out, that Christ suffered death for his enimies. For thercupon we gather, that he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying, I fanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruite of his holines vnto other, doth thereby teftsie that he purchaseth nothing for himselfe. And truly this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to giue himselfe wholistic to saue vs, did after a certaine manner forget himselfe. But to this purpose they doe wrongfully draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the Father hath exalted him, and giuen him a name, &c. For by what deservings could man obtaine to be Judge of the world, and the head of the Angels, and to enjoy the soueraigne dominion of God, and that in him should rest that same majestie, the thousandth part whereof all the powers of men and Angels can not reach vnto? But the solution thereof is cæsare and plaine, that Paul doth not there intreate of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect enfluing thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behoueth that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glory of Father.
Ow it is to be seene how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his onely begotten Sonne, not for his owne private use, but to enrich them that were without them and needed them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoeuer he suffered or did for the salvation of mankinde, is vnprouitable and nothing availleth for vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receuied of his Father, it behooueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, that we are graffed into him, & did put on him. For (as I haue before said,) al that ever he posseseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine by this faith, yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartenng of Christ, which is offered by the Gospell, therefore vnder reason teacheth vs to clime vp higher, and to enquire of the secret effectuall working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enjoy Christ and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternall godhead, and essence of the spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and blood that the Spirit should testify of him, lest the salvation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are allready three witnesses in heaven, the Father, the Worde, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twise repeated, which we see to be engraven in our hearts in stead of a seal: whereby commeth to passe, that it saith in the washing and sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the Spirit vnto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Christ. By which words he teloth vs, that to the entent the f Hedding of that holy blood should not become void, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret working of the holy Spirit. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and justification, saith that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy spirit is the bond wherewith Christ effectuallly bindeth vs vnto him. For proofe wherof also do fere all that we haue taught in the last booke befor this, concerning his anointing.

But that this, being a matter especially worthie to be knowne, may bee made more certainly evident, we must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the

the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar manner, to the end that he might seuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternal inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirit of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankinde as in all other living creatures, but also is in vs the root and seed of heavenly life. Therefore the Prophets doe principally commend the kingdom of Christ by this title of prerogative, that then should flourish more plentiful abundance of the Spirit. And notable above all the rest is that place of 2 Cor: In that day I will powre of my Spirit vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there feeme to restraine the gifts of the Spirit to the office of a prophesying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightening of his Spirit will make those his schollers which before were vnskilful and void of all heavenly doctrine. Now forasmuch as God the Father doth for his sons sake giue vs his holy Spirit, & yet hath left with him the whole fulnes thereof, to the end that he should be a minister and distributer of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the Spirit of the Father, and somtime the Spirit of the Sonne. Ye are not (Faith Paul) in the flesh, but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any have not the Spirit of Christ, he is not his. And hereupon he putteth vs in hope of full ranuing, for that he which raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortal bodys, because of his Spirit dwelling in vs. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father be ascribed the praise of his owne gifts, whereof he is the author: and yet that the fame be ascribed to Christ, with whom the gifts of the Spirit are left, that he may giue them to those that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirit is distributed to every one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be known, that he is called the Spirit of Christ, not onely in respect that the etemall Word of God is with the same Spiritioynd with the Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had power, he had cometo vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam giuen from heauen, to bee a quickening Spirit: whereby Paul compar eth the singular life that the Sonne of God breatheth into them that be his, that they may be all one with him, with the natural life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he witnesseth to the faithfull the favoure of Christ and the love of God, he joyned withall the common partaking of the Spirit, without whiche no man can take neither of the fatherly favoure of God, nor of the bountifulnesse of Christ. As also he saith in another place: The love of God is powerd out into our harts by the holy Spirit that is giuen vs.

3 And here it shall be profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth out the holy Spirit, where it entreateth of beginning and whole restorong of our saluation. First, he is called the Spirit of adoption, because he is a witness vnto vs of the free good will of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloved only begotten Sonne, that he might be a Father vnto vs, and doth encourage vs to pray boldly, yea and doth minister vs words to encrease vs in seare, Abba, Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest pledge, and seal of our inheritance, because he doth giue vfe from heauen to vs wandring in the world, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soule is in safegard vnder the faithfull keeping of God, for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteoussenesse. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring forth the buds of righteousnesse, he is oftentimes called water as in Esay: All yee that thirst come to the waters. Again: I will poure out my Spirit vpon the thirsty, & floods vpon the dry land: wherewith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did euen nowe allerge. If any thirst let him come to me. Albeit somtime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleane, as in Ezechiel where the Lord promiseth cleane waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as he restored and and nouriseth into lively quicknes, them vpon whom he hath powred the liquour of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of ource and annointment. Again because in continually seething out and burning vp the vices of our luft, he setteth our hartes on fire with the loue of God and zeale of godlines, he is also for this effect woorthily called fire. Finally, he is described vnto vs as a fountain, from whence do flowe vnto vs all heavenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he vseth his power: because by the breath of his power he do breatheth divine life into vs, that wee are not nowe stirred by our felues, but ruled by his stirring, and mouing: so that if there bee any good things in vs, they be the fruits of his grace: but our owne gifts without him, be darknes of minde, and peruerfenes of hart. This point is set out plainly enough, that till our mindes be bent vpon the holy Ghost, Christ lieth in a maner idle, because we coldly efpie him vnto vs, yea and farre away from vs. But we knowe that he profetheth nothing other then those whele head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, & them which have put on him. This coining by onely maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not unprofitably with the name of Saviour. And for proofe hereofferteth that holy marriage, whereby wee are made flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirit onely he maketh himselfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same spirite we are made his members, so that hee conteneeth vs vnder him, and we againe possesse him.

4. But forasmuch as faith is his principal worke, to it are for the most part referred all those things, that we commonly finde spoken to expresse his force & working: because he bringeth vs into the light of the gospell by nothing but by faith: as John Baptift teacheth, that this prerogative is giuen to them that beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh & bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh & bloud, he affirmeth it to be a supernatural gift that they receive Christ by faith, who otherwisedo remain subject to their owne infidelitie. Like whereunto is that answer of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not revealed it to thee, but my father which is in heauen. These things I do now but shorty touch, because I have already intreated of them at large. And like alfo is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy spirite of promise. For Paul theweth that he is an inward teacher, by whose working the promis of saluation pearceeth into our mindes, which otherwise should but beeare the aire or our caires. Likewhile, when he faith, that the Thefalonians were choosen of God in the sanctification of the Spirit and beleuing of the truth: by which ioyning of them together, he briefly admonisseth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing else but from the holy spirite: which thing John setteth out more plainly, saying: Wee know that there abideth in vs of the spirite which he hath giuen vs. Againe, by this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath giuen vs of his spirite. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the spirite of truth which the world cannot receive, that they might be able to receive the heavenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same spirite this proper office, to put them in minde of those things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine shoulde the light shew it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the name spirite of understanding shoulde open the eies of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirite, the keye by which the treasures of the heavenly kingdom are opened vnto vs: & may call his enlightening, the eyeflight of our minde to see. Therefore doth S. Paul so much commend the minifterie of the spirite: because teachers should criie without professing, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inward master should draw them with his spirite that are giuen him by his Father. Therefore as we have said, that perfect saluation is founde in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirite and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospell, and so newe begetting vs, that we may be new creatures: and purging vs from vnholie filthineffe, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

The
Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that is hath, are declared.

But all these things shall be easy to understand: when there is shewed a plain definition of faith, that the Readers may know the force and nature thereof. But first it is convenient to call to minde againe these things that have been alreadie spoken, that Sith God doth appoint vs by his law what we ought to do, if we fall in anie point thereof, the same terrible judgement of eternall death that hee pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Againe, that forasmuch as it is not onely hard but altogether aboue our strength and beyond all our power to fulfill the lawe if we onely beholde our selues, and weigh what estate is worthie for our desertings, there is no good hope left, but we heie cast away from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdly, this hath beene declared, that there is but one meane of deliuerance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hande it pleased the heauenly father, having mercy vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, that wee with sound faith embrace this mercy, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is convenient for vs to weigh this, what manner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to bee his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenly kingdome, forasmuch as it is certaine that not euery opinion nor yet euery perswasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and studie must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall proprietie of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the error of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the worldes, hearing the name of faith, conceiued no higher thing, but a certaine common affent to the historie of the Gospell. Yea, when they dispute of faith in the schooles, in barely calling god the object of faith, they do nothing but (as we have saide in another place), by vaine speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true marke. For whereas God dwelleth in a light that none can attain to, but behoueth of necessity that Christ become meane betweene vs & it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, The way, the truth, & the life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountain of life) but by him: because he onely knoweth the Father, & by him the faithful to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason Paul affirmeth, that he accounted nothing excellent to be knowne, but Christ: & in the xx. chapter of the Acts, he faith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place hee bringeth in Christ speaking after this manner, I will sende thee among the Gentiles that they may receive forgivinge of sinnes, and potent among holy ones, by the faith which is in me. And Paul testifieth, that the glory of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glorie shineth in his face. It is true indeed that faith hath respect onely to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whom he hath sent, euen Jesus Christ. Because God himselfe should have kept secret & hidden farre from vs, ynellie the brightnesse of Christ did cast his beams vpon vs. For this intent the father left all that he had with his onely begotten sonne, euen by the communicating of good things with him to express the true image of his glorie. For as it is said, that we must be drawne by the spirite, that we may be hirred to seeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the invisible Father is no where else to be sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speakeketh excellently well, which intreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, faith that wee must knowe whether we must goe and which way: and then by, and by after he gathereth that the safest way against all errors is he that is both God and man. For it is God to whom we go, and man by whom we go: and both these are found nowhere, but in Christ. Neither doth Paul when he speaketh of faith in God, mean to overthrow that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay upon Christ. And Peter doth most fitly joyneth them both together, saying that by him we believe in God.

Therefore this cuill, even as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen; which have hidden Christ as if it were with a veile drawn before him, to the beholding of whom vnleffe we be directly bent, were shall alway wander in many vn certaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they doe dace and in a manner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they have forgot a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most groffe ignorance doe with great hurt deceive the silly people, yea (to lay truely and plainly as the thing is in deed) this deuise doth not onely burie but vterly destroy the true faith.

Is this to beleue, to vnderstand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sente to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not onely of God, but of the will of God. For neither doe we obtaine salvation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoever the Church appointeth, or that we doe commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to be a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is given vs into righteousness, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submitting of our sente, we attain an entrance into the kingdom of heaven. For when the Apostle faith, that with the hart we beleue to righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made to salvation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressedly beleue that which he vnderstandeth not, nor seeketh to learn, but he requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodness in which consisteth our righteousness.}

3. In deed I deny not (such is the ignorance wherewith we are compassed) that there now be and hereafter shall be many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till having put off the burden of our flesh we come nearer to the presence of God; in which very things that are hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our judgemen, but to lay our minde in determined purpose to keepe vnitie with the Church. But vnder this colour to intitle ignorance tempered with humility by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God and of Christ, not in reverence of the Church. And we see what a maze they have framed with this their hidden implication, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choice, so that it be thrust in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monstrous errors. Which vnaduised lighness of beleue, whereas it is a most certaine downfall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueth nothing determinately, but with this condicion adjoyned, If the faith of the Church be lye. So doe they faile, that truth is holde in error, light in blindness, true knowledge in ignorance. But because we will not tire in confusing them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainnesse of the truth it selfe will of it selfe minifter a confusion ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remants of ignorance, but they definitlye say that they beleue aright, which stand amazed in their ignorance, yea and doe flatter themselves therein, so that they doe agree to the authoritie and judgemen of the Church, concerning things vnot known. As though the Scripture did not every where teach, that with faith is joined knowledge.

4. But we do grant, that so long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expresse, not onely because many things are yet hidden from vs, but because being compassed with many mistes of errors, we attaine not all things. For the

the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and proceed on further forward with gentle willingness to learn. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithfull, if upon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for revelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vnoth t clothed of our flesh, we attain to knowledge less than were to be wishe, and daily in reading we light upon many dark places which do convince us of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth vs in moderate, assigning to every one a measure of faith, that every one may be ready to learn. And notable examples of this unexpressed faith, we may mark in the Disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightened. We see, how they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did tucke even in the smallest points, how they hanging at the mouth of their mower did not yet much proceed, yea when at the women's information they ranne to the grave, the resurrection of their mawer was like a dreame unto them. Sith Christ did before beare witness of their faith, we may not say that they were utterly without faith; but rather if they had not been persuaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him would have perished in them. For it was not superstitition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpse of a dead man of whom there was no hope of life: but although they beleued his words whom they knewe to be a speaker of truth, yet the grossesse of that still pooffed their minds so wrapped their faith in darkeness, that they were in a manner amazed at it. Whereupon it is faide, that they then at the last beleued when they had by triall of the thing it selde proved the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then began to beleue, but because the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiuing liueliness, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an unexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christ for their only teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to seeke any more familiar proffes hereof than this, that in all things alway unbeliefe is mingled with faith.

5 We may also call it an unexpressed faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Evangelists do rehearse that many beleued, which only being raunified to admiration with miracles, proceded no further but that Christ was the Messiah which had bin promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any Declension of the Gospel. Such obedience, which brought them in subjection willingly to submit themselves to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deed but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christ's promise, concerning the healing of his son when he came home, as the Evangelist testifieth, beleued against: because he received as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted himselfe to his authoritie to recieve his doctrine. Albeit it is to be knowne, that he was so tractable & ready to learn, that yet in the first place the word of the beleuing signifieth a particular beleue: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the schollers of Christ. A like example doth John set forth in the Samaritans, which to beleued the women's report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleue not: because of thy report, but we haue heard him, & we know that he is the Saviour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithfull, in deed not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindness giveth them earnestly to grant them to great honour to that godly affection. But this willingness to learn, with a desire to proceed further, differeth farre from that grosse ignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the unexpressed faith, such as the Papists have imagined. For if Paul seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet... neuer come to the knowledge of truth, how much more grievous reproche doe they deserve that of purpose studie to knowe nothing.

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receive him such as he is offer'd of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to be the mark of our faith, so we cannot goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide vs. And truly there are opened to vs the treasures of grace; which being shut vp, Christ should little profit vs. So Paulioyneth faith an unsepara-table companion to doctrine, where he faith: Yee haue not so learned Christ, for yee haue beene taught what is the truth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath beene so much taught by Mofes and the Prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath beene deliure-red in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthly called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause alfo hee faith in another place, that by the comming of faith the lawe is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the newe and vauncoumed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our school-a master, hath more plainly set forth the merie of his father, and more certainly refiished of our salvacion. Albeit it shall be the more capte and more convenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generalitie to the specialtie. First we must be put in minde that there is a general relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more bee seperated from the worde, than the sunne beames from the sunne from whome they proceede. Therefore in Efaie God crieth out: Hear me and your soule shall live. And that the same is the fountain of faith, John sheweth in these wordes: These things are written that ye may beleue. And the Prophet meaning to exhorte the people to beleefe, faith: This day if yee shall hear his voice. And to hear is commonly taken for to beleue. Moreover, God doth not without cause in Efaie setthis mark of difference betwene the children of the Church and strangers, that he will instruc them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were benefite vnierrall to all, why should he direct his wordes to a few? Wherewith agreeth this that the Evangelists doe commonly vse the worde Faithfull and Disciiples, as feuerall wordes expressing one thing, and specially Luke very oft in the Actes of the Apostles. Yea and hee stretcheth that name even to a woman in the ninth Chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith doe vary never so little from this mark, to which it ought to be directly levell'd, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becommeth an vncestaine lightnesse of beleefe and wandring error of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and sustaine, from which if it swarne, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. We doe not here dispute whether the ministerie of man bee necesarlie to fowse the Worde of God that faith may been conceied thereby, which question we will elsewhere intreate of: but we say that the Worde is seelie, howsoever it be conveyed to vs, is like a mirour when faith may beholde God. Whether God doth therein vfe the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne only power, yet he doth alway shewe himselfe by his Worde to those, whom his will is to drawe ynde him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is given to the Gospell Rom.1. And in another place he praiseth the obedience of faith in the Philippians.
For this is not the onely purpose in the understanding of faith, that we knowe that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we understand what will he beareth vs.
For it not so much behooueth vs to knowe what he is in himselfe, but what a one he will be to vs. Now therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of Godd, perceiued by the worde. And the foundation hereof is a for-conceived persuasion of the truth of God. Of the assiurednesse whereof so long as thy minde shall dispute with it selfe, the word shall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credite at all. But alfo it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, speaker, which can neither deceive nor lie; vnllefe thou further holde this for undoubtedly determined, that whatsoever proceeded from him, is the sacred and inviolable truth.

7 But because not at every word of God mans heart is raised vp to faith, wee must yet further search what this faith in the word hath properly respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The broode of thy brother crieth to mee out of the earth. Yet these are such sayings as of themselves can do nothing but thake faith, so much leffe are they able to stablifi faith. We denie not in the meane reason that it is the office of faith to agree to the truthe of God, how of loouer, what foever, and in what fort soever it speake: but now our question is onely, what faith hindeth in the word of the Lord to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation and vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how should it but flee God, of whom it is afraid? But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we have not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accounted for faith, to know the will of God, of what sort soever it be: But what if in the place of will, whereas many times the message is sorrowfull and the declaration dreadful, we put handes or mercie? Truely so we shall come nearer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that we have learned that salvation is laide vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that he hath care and looue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may teftifie that he is our mercifull father, for that otherwise we cannot approach vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Psalms these two things Mercie and Truth do cleaue together, because neither should it any thing professe to know that God is true, vnlesse he did mercifullly allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy salvation, I haue not hidden thy goodness and thy truth. Thy goodness and thy truth kepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heavens, thy truth euon to the clouds. Againe: All the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his covenant. Againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the truth of the Lord abideth for euer. Againe: I will sing to thy name vpon thy mercie and truth. I omit that which is in the Prophets to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promisses. For wee shall rathe more determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe do teftifie of himselfe, and present vs with his calling, leaft his will should be doubtfull and vnknowen. But we haue alreadie seene, that Christ is the only pledge of his love, without whom on euerie side appeares the tokens of hatred and wrath. Now forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodness shall not much proue, vnlesse he make vs to rest in it, therefore such an understanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not foundlie agree in it selfe, but as it were, dispuette with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is far from attaining and climbing vp to perceive the verie will of God; and also the hart of man, as it wanereth with perpetuall doubting, is far from resteing assured in that persuasion. Therefore it behooveth both that our wit be lightened, and our heart strengthened by some other means, that the word of God may be offull credule with vs. Now we shall have a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a steadfast and assuered knowledge of Gods kindnes toward vs, which being grounded upon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both receuied to our minde, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceede anie further, it shall be necessarie that I make some preambles to disloue certaine doubts that otherwise might make some stop to the readers. And first I must confesse that distinction that flyeth about in the schooles, between the true and full definition of faith.

The true and full definition of faith. Gen.2.17&8.
Of the manner how to receive

Between faith formed and unformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no fear of God, with no feeling of godliness, do believe all that is necessary to salvation. As though the holy Ghost in lightning our hearts unto faith, were not a witness to us of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they give the name of faith to such perswasion void of the fear of God. We need to strive no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the words of God. Whereby shall plainly appear how unskillfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speak of it. If I have already touched part, the rest I will add hereafter as place shall serve. At this present I say that there cannot be imagined a greater absurdity, than this mentioning of theirs. They will have faith to be an assent, whereby every deliuer of God may receive that which is veered out of the Scripture. But first they should have seen whether every man of his owne power doe bring faith to himself, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witness of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly play the fools, in demanding whether faith which a qualitie added doth form, be the same faith or an other and a new faith. Whereby appeareth certainly, that in so babbling they never thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of believing doth already containe in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul: With the heart is believed to righteousness, they would cease to faine that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should be sufficient to end this contention: that the very same assent (as I have already touched, and will againe more largely repeat) is rather of the heart than of the braine, rather of affection than of understanding. For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, which is such as the Lord preferrreth no kinde of obedience above it: and that worthily, for as much as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as John the Baptist witnesseth, the beleuers doe as it were subscribe and seal unto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull we doe in one word determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that faith is formed by adding of godly affection unto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is another plainer argument that offereth it selfe to be alledged. For whereas faith embraceth Christ as he is offered vs of the father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousnesse, forgiuenesse of finnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountain of living water: without doubt no man can euery truly know him, vndlee he doe therewithall receive the sanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man desire to have it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot be known but with sanctification of his spirit: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be feuered from godly affection.

9 Whereas they are wont to lay this against vs, that Paul faith: If a man have all faith, so that he remoue mountains, if he have not charitie, he is nothing; whereby they would deforme faith, in spoiling it of charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the divers gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which he had reckoned the divers kinde of languages, power and prophecie, and had exhort the Corinthians to follow the beft of these gifts, that is to say, such gifts whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole bodie of the Church: he straightway faide further, that hee woulde shewe them yet a more excellent way. That all such gifts, howe excellent soever they bee of themselues, yet are they nothing to be esteemed, vndlee they serve charitie. For they were given to the edifying of the Church, and vndlee they be applied hereunto, they loose their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearseth them repeating the selfe same gifts that hee had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which every man may both have and abuse, as the gift of tongues, as prophetic and other gifts of grace: it is no marvel if it be feared from charity. But all the error of these men standeth in this, that where this word Faith, hath divers significations, they not considering the diversities of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of James which they allege for maintenance of the same error, shall be else where discoursed. But although for teachings fake, when we mean to what manner of knowledge of God, there is in the wicked, we grant that there are divers sorts of faith: yet we acknowledge and speak of but one faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many in deed do believe that there is a God, they think that the historical of the Gospel and other parts of the scripture are true (as commonly we are wont to judge of such things, as either are reported being done long agoe, or such as we ourselues have beene present at and seene.) There be also somewhat go further, for both they beleue the word of God to be a most assured oracle, and they do not altogether despise his commandements, and they somewhat after a fort are moued with his threatenings and promises. It is indeed testified that such have faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they do not with open vngodlines fight against the word of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shew of obedience.

10 But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not woorthie of the name of faith. From the sound truth whereof how farre it differeth, although it shal be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is said, that Simon Magus beleued, which yet within a little after betrayed his owne unbelieve. And whereas it is saide that he beleued, we do not understand it as some do, that he gained a beleife when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being overcome with the maistrie of the Gospell, he had a certeine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is saide in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleue for a time, in whom the seed of the word is chocked vp before it bring forth fruit, or before it take any roote at all, it by and by withereth away and periseth: we doubt not that such delited with a certeine taste of the word do greedily receive it, and begin to feel the divine force of it: so faire that with deceitfull counterfating of faith, they beguile not onely other mens eies, but also their owne mindes. For they persuade themselves, that that reuerence which they shew to the word of God, is most true godlines, because they thinke that there is no vngodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his word. But what manner of affect ofuer that be, it pæreth not to the verie heart to remaine there stablisht: and though sometime it semeth to have taken rootes, yet those are not luyly rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is coverd with so guilefull hypocrisie, that it oft deceiveth himselfe. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith understand, that therein they are no beter than the Diuell. But that first sort of men are farre worste than the Diuell, which do falsely heare and understand those things, for knowledge whereof the Diuels do tremble. And the other are in this point equal with the diuell, that the feeling such as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth only to terror and discouragement.

11 I know that some thinke it harde, that we assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the fruit of election. Which doubt ye is easily dispelled: for though none receive the light of faith, nor do truly feel the effectual working of the Gospel, but they that are foreordained to saluation; yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime moued with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne judgemen they nothing differ from the elect.
Cap. 2. Of the manner how to receive

Wherefore it is no absurditie, that the Apostile aforesibeth to them the taste of the heavenly gifts, that Christ aforesibeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceive the spiritual force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lord, the more to condemne them and make them inexcusable, commeth himselfe into their minde to farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If any obiect, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithful where by to proue certainly their adoption: I anfwer that though there be a great likenes and afinitie betweene the elect of God and them that are enuaded with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onely that affiance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seede for ever, so that the seede of life planted in their harts neuer perisheth, so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that other inferiour working of the Spirtue may haue his course, even in the reprobate. In the mean season the faithfull are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themselves, leaft in stead of assurednes of faith, to crepe in careless confidence of the flese. Befide that, the reprobate do never conceiue but a confirmed feeling of grace, fo that they rather take hold of the shadow than of the sound bodie, because the holy spirit doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect onely, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their vile. But yet it is truly said, that the reprobate believe God to be mercifull vnto them, because they receive the gift of reconciliation, although confusely and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the selves same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the fame beginning of faith, under a cloke of hypocrisie. And I denie not, that God doth so far giue light vnto their minde, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they never come to the sound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shew himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that he haueing truly delured them from death, doth receive them to his safegard, but onely he delieth to them a present mercy. But he vouchfaeth to graunt to the only elect the lively root of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that objection answered, if God do truly shew his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually established, for that there is no caufe to the contrarie, but that God may enlighten some with a preuent feeling of his grace, which afterward vanishe away.

Wicked men who by reason of a vn-nishing sweetness which they fee in the grace of God towards the for a lieue, ye indeed do embrace what they should nor as they should.

faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the spirit of God, and a scale of their adoption, the print thereof can never be blotted out of their harts: as for the reprobate, that they are overspried with such a light as afterward commeth to ought, and yet the spirit is not deceitful, because he gueth not life to the seed that he causeth in their harts, to make it abide alwayes incorruptible, as he doeth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is evident by the teaching of the Scripture and by daily experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of God's grace, it must needs be that there is raised in their harts a certaine desire of mutuell love. So for a time therelieud in Saul a godly affection to love God, by whom he knew himself to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweeteneffe of his goodnesse. But as the persifluation of the fatherly love of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate; so do they not soundly love him againe as his children, but are ledde with a certaine affection like hired seruants. For to Christ onely was the spirit of loue given, to this ende, that hee shoulde poure it into his members. And truely that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onely. The loue of God is powred abroad into our harts by the holy Spirit that is given us, even the same loue that engendereth the same confidence of calling upon him, which I have before touched. As on the contrarie side we see God to be maruellously angrie with his children, whom yet he causeth not to loue; not that in himselfe he hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of flesh, to shake off their drou-sitene, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore all at one tyme they concive him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull to them: because they not faineclly doe praine to appease his wrath, to whome yet they flee with quiet assurred trute. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some doe counterfaite a shew of faith, which yet do lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodaine violent motion of Zeale, they deceive themselves with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishtesse do possessthem, that they doe not wel examine their hart as they ought to have done. It is likelye that they were such to whom (as John witnesseth) Christ did not commit himselfe when yet they beleued in him, because hee knew them all, and knew what was in man.
If manie did not fall from the common faith (I call it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse and affinitie with the liuely and continuing faith) Christ would not have said to his Disciples: If yee abide in my word, then are yee truly my Disciples, and yee shall knowe the truth, and the truth shall make you free. For yee speakes to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishtene queench the light that is given them. Therefore doth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanisht away, because they have not taken liuely root. Like as Christ also faith in Matthew: every tree that my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kind of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. James inucteth against that kind of men, that with deceitfull pretence do wickedly abuseth faith. Neither would Paul require of the children of God a faith vnfained, but in respect that many do presumpeoullie challeng and to themselfes that which they have not, and with vaine coloured deceit do beguile other or sometime themselfes. Therefore he compareth a good confidence to a sheepe wherein faith is kept, because manie in falling from good confidence, have suffered shipwrecke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the worde faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sound doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now allledge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will have Deacons to holde fast the mysterie of fath in a pure conscience. Again, where he publisheth the falling away

14. Now let us againe go through all the parts of it, even from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I think) there shall remaine nothing doubtful. When in defining Faith we call it a knowledge, we mean not thereby a comprehending, such as men vfe to have of those things that are subiect to mans understanding. For it is so far above it, that mans wit must goe beyond and surmount it. selfe to come vnto it, yea, and when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it feeleth, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiueth not, it surmounteth more by the very assurednesse of perswasion, than if it did with mans owne capacitie throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith very well, where he calleth it to comprehend that which is the length, brede, depth, and heighe, and to know the loute of Christ that far surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiueth by Faith, is every way infinite, and that this kind of knowledge is far higher than all understanding. But yet because the Lord hath disclosed to his Saints the secret of his will which was hid from ages and generations, therefore by good reason Faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledgiment, and John calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he saith hee thinke, that the Faithfull doe certainly know that they are the children of God. And undoubtedly they know it alluely, but rather by being confirmed by perswasion of Gods truth, than by being informed by natural demonstration. And this also the words of Paul doe declare saying, that while we dwell in the body, we are wandering abroad from the Lord, because we walk by Faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we understand by Faith, are yet absent from us and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of Faith standeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

15 We further call it a sure and steadfast knowledge, to express thereby a more found constancie of persuasion. For as Faith is not contented with a doubtfull and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke and entangled understanding; but requireth a full and fixed assur'dnes, such as men are wont to have of things found by experience and proued. For vnbeliefe sticketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our harts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is Faithfull, no man is without great contention persuaded in his hart. Specially when he commeth to the proofe, then the watering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation maintaineth the authentick of the word of God, but endeuoureth to giue remedie for the aforesaid diseasе, that God may obtaine to be fully beleued of vs in his promises: The words of the Lord (faith Da•mid)are pure words, as the Siluer tried in a furnace of earth, fixed seven times. Again, The word of the Lord standeth a shield to all that trust in him. And Solomon confirming the same, and in a maner in the same words, faith: Every word of God is pure. But 6th the whole 119. Psalme entreateth onely in a manner vpon the same, it were superfluous to alledge any more places. Truely so oft as God doth so commend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the way reproch vs with our vnbelieuingnes: because that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to roote vp all peturcious doubtfulings out of our harts. There be also many which suo conceuie the merie of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be cuit therewithall pinched with a miserable carefullnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enclose within too narrow bounds the very same mercifullnesse, of which they thinke themselves most assuredly persuaded. For thus they thinke with themselves, that his merie is in deed great and plentiful pour'd out vpon manie, offering it selfe and ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it will extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the midrace, is but an halfe. Therefore it doth not so confirm the heart with assur'd quietnesse, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doubtfulnes. But there is a far other feeling of full assur'dnesse, which in the Scriptures is alwayes assignified to Faith, eu'n such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodness of God, doth clearly put it out of doubt. And that cannot be, but that we must needs truly seelie & proue in our selves the sweetenes thereof. And therefore the Apostle out of Faith describeth assur'd confidence, and out of it againe boldnes. For thus he faith, that by Christ we have boldnes, and an entrance with confidence, which is through Faith in him. By which words truly he heweth, that it is no right Faith, but when wee are bole with quiet minde to shew our selves in the presence of God. Which boldnes proceedeth not but of assur'd confidence of Gods good will and our saluation. Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is vld for Confidence.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefstay of our Faith, that we doe not thinke the promises of mercy which the Lord offereth to be true onely in other beside vs, and not at all in our selves: but rather that inwardly embracing them, we make them our owne. From hence proceedeth that confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, vnbeliefe some had rather say, that Peace is deriv'd of it. It is an assurednes that maketh the Conscience quiet and chearfull before God, without which the Conscience must of necessity be vexed, and in a manner torn in pieces with troublesome trembling, vnbeliefe perhaps it doe forget God and it selfe, and so flumber a little while. And I may truly say, For a little while, for it doth not long enjoy that miserable forgetfulness, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of God's judgement sharply tormenteth. Briefly, there is none truly faithfull, but he that being perswaded with a found assurednesse that God is his mercifull and loving father, doth promise himselfe all things upon truft of God's goodness: and none but he that truuffling upon the promises of God's good will toward him, conceiveth an undoubted looking for of salvation: as the Apostle theweth in these words: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heir of the kingdom of heauen, There is none (I say) faithfull, but he that leaning upon the assurednesse of his owne salvation, doth confidently triumph upon the Deuell and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am perswaded (faith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate vs from the love of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Iesu. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane well lightened, vntill we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And each where his common manner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no otherwis we do not well comprehend the goodness of God, vntill we gather of it the fruite of great assurednesse.

17 But (some man will say) the faithfull do finde by experience a farre other thing within themselues, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not only tempted with vnquietnesse, which oftentimes chanceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrours: so great is the vehement of temptations to throw downe their minde: which thing feemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therfore this doubt must be answered, if we wil haue our aforesaid doctrine to stand. But truely when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, we do not imagine such a certaine as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is affaile with no carefullnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulness. So farre be we from setting their consciences in such a peaceable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sort soeuer they be affected, they do never fall & depart from that assured confidence which they have conceived of the mercy of God. The scripture setteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in David, specially if a man beholde the whole continual course of his life. But yet how he was not alway of quiet minde himselfe declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reprocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angrie with his owne vnbelievingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (faith he) and why art thou disquieted within me? truist in God. And truely that same discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, even as if he thought himselfe to be forfaken of God. And in another place were made a larger complaint thereof, where he faith: I said in my overthrow, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in another place he disputeth with himselfe in carefull and miserable perplexity yea and quarrelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath God forgotten to have mercy? will he cast off for ever? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I have said, To die is mine charges are of the right hand of the highet. For, as in despaine he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not only condemneth himselfe to be tossed with doubting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaveth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forfaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had found found by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waues. And yet (which is marvellous) in all these assaults, Faith vpholdeth the hartes of the godly, and is truly like vnto a Date tree to enduror and rife vpward against all burden, how great soever they be: as David when he might seeme to be utterly overwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, ceaseth not to rife vp to God. And truly he that triuing with his owne weaknesses, reforteth to Faith in his troubles, is alreadie in a manner conqueror. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Wait for the Lord, be strong, he shall strengthen thy hart: wait for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearedleness, and in repeating that fame twife, confesseth himselfe to be sometimes subject to many troublesome motions. And in the mean time he doth not onely become displeased with himselfe in these faults, but earnestly endoweth to amendment. Truly if we will more neerely by good examination compare him with Ahab, there shall be found great difference; Esaie was sent to bring remedy to the carefull griefe of the wicked King and hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these words: Be in safeguard and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Ahab? As it was before saide, that his hart was bowed as the trees of the wood are shaken with wind, though he heard the promise, yet he ceaseth not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of unbeliefe, to tremble for feare, in that temptation he cuteth himselfe away from God, that doth not open to himselfe the gate by Faith. Contrariwise the faithfull who the waighty burden of temptations maketh to stoupe, and in a maner oppreffe, doe constantly rife vp, although not without trouble and hardnes. And because they know their owne weaknesses, they pray with the Prophet: Take not the word of truth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that sometime they become dumme as though their Faith were vterly overthrown, yet they faint not, nor turne their backs, but proceede in their battell, and with prayer doe encourage their slouthfulnes, lest by favouring themselves they should grow to vnseensible dulleas.

18 For the understanding thereof, it is needfull to returne to that diuision of the flesh and the spirite, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe most clearely appeare. The godly hart therefore feeleth a diuision in it selfe, which is partly delited with sweeterenesse by acknowleding the goodnesse of God, and partly grieved with bitternes by feeling of his owne miferie, partly refeth vpon the promise of the Gospel, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimony of his owne wicketliness: partly rejoyseth with conceiuing of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation commeth by imperfection of Faith, forasmuch as we never be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all danger of distrustfulness to be aliogether filled and possessed with Faith. Hereupon proceede those barretts, when the distrustfullnesse that abideth in the remannts of the flesh, riseth vp to affaille the Faith that is inwardly concieved. But if in a faithfull minde assurednesse be mixed with doubtfullnesse, come we not alway to this point, that Faith standeth not in a certaine and clere knowledge, but in a darke and doubtfully entangled knowdlege of Gods will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diversly drawne with fundrie thoughts, ye are we not therefore by and by scourred from Faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp and downe of distrustfullnes, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomles depth thereof: and though we be shaken, yet be we not thrust downe out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battell, that Faith doth at length with wraftling overcome those hard troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of Faith, be it never so small, is poured into our hartes, we by and by begin to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and louing toward vs: yet the fame we see from a far off, and far distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceived. From thenceforward the grace of Christ. Lib.3. 148

Cap. 2.

Of the manner how to receive forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come into so much the nearer, and therefore certain beholding of him, and by verie continuance he is made more familiar unto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first held in wrapped in much ignorance, which by little and little is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkely seeing that which the see thefe, but that the enioyeth a cleere knowledge of God's will toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, have beams of the sunne shining in sidelong at a narrow window, or as it were but halfe glimmering, he wanteth in deed the free beholding of the sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an undoubted brightnesse thereof, and receiueth the vse of it: so we being bound with the fettiers of an earthly body, howsoever we be on each side shadowed with much darknes, yet are we sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect light, by the light of God, extending his beams of light vpon vs, though it be but a little, to shew forth his mercy.

20 Both these points the Apostle verie well teacheth in divers places. For when he saith, that we know imperfectly, and propheticke imperfectly, and see by a darke speaking as by a glaffe, he sheweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wife dome is given vs in this present life. For though those words do not expressly shew that our faith is imperfect so long as we grope under this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs, by our owne impfection that we have need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be comprehended by our small capaciteit, and narrow compasse. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto every one of vs, his owne dulnes is an hinderance and stay, that he cannot come so near as were to be withal. But how sure and undeceivable a taste of it selfe, even a sall drop of faith doth make vs selfe, the fame Apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Gospel we beholde the glory of God with vndecovered face, housing no veil between vs and it, so effectuallie that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doubting and fearfull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine natural instinct of it selfe, is inclined to vnbelieuines. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and divers in kinde, do often times with great foaine violence affright vs. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauen burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament and groan with it selfe, and sometime accuseth it selfe: sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduerfities doe shew an appearance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth find in it selfe any proofe of matter of his wrath, then ence vnbeliefe doth take weapons and engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our adversarie, and hatefully bent against vs, should both no hope for any helpe at this hand, and also be afraid of him as of our deadly enemy.

21 To beare these affright, faith doth arm vs and fortifieth selfe with the word of God. And when such a tentation affrighteth, that God is our enemie, because hee is sharp against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he puniseth he is also mercifull, because his chastisement commeth rather of love than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that God is a reuenuer of iniquities, against that stroke he seteth his pardon ready for all offences, so oft as the finner returneth to the mercifullnesse of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoever it be in maruellous wise tossed and vexed, yet at length believeth vp above all dangers, and never suffereth the confidence of Gods mercie to be plucked away from it. But rather whatsoever contemptions do trouble and wearie it, in the eade they turne to the assurancnesse of this confidence. confidence. And hereof this is a profe : that the holy ones, when they think themselves moft of all prifed with the vengeance of God, yet even then doe make their complaints to the fame God : and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then nevertheless they call upon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their mone to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would never finde in their harts to call upon him, vntele they beleued that there were some helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smallnes of faith, complained in deede that they perished, but yet they called to him for helpe. And when he rebuked them for their small faith, yet he doth not reject them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleeuers, but shurteth them to shak off that fault. Therefore we affirme againe that we haue aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is never plucked out of a godly hart, but thrusteth fo oft in the bottom, that howsoever it be shaken and seeme to bend this way or that way, the light thereof is so never quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidden vnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the word which is an uncorruptible seede, bringeth forth fruite like to it selfe, the spring whereof doeth never wither and utterly perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of despaire to the holi ones, to feele according to the consideration of present things, the hande of God bent to their destruccion: yet 105 affirme that his hope shall proceede so farre, that though God doe kill him, yet he will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore. Vnbeleevers reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardly afflicteth them: neither doth the deadly wounde them with her weapons, but only troubleth them, or so hurte them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, seuereth vs from a shield that being holden vp against weapons, doth so receive the force of them, that it either vntidie driveth them backes, or at least to breaketh their violence, that they cannot pierce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong fouldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remoue his foote, and giue ground a little: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not staken through. For alway the godhe mind will attaine to rise thus hie as to say with David, if I walke in the middeft of the shadow of death, I will feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is indeed terible to walke in the darknes of death, and it cannot bee but that the faithfull, howe much strength soucre they haue, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, that they have God present with them, and proouing for their safety, that feare is overcome with assurednes.For (as Augustine faith) how great engines foeuer the devil raffeth vp against vs, fo long as hee poynteth not the place of the hart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if we may judge by the fucffe, the faith-full not onely escape safe from euery battle, so that by and by receiuing faith courage they are ready to come againe into the field: but also that is fulfilled which Iohn faith in his canonicaall Epistle: This is the victory that overcometh the worlde, euen your faith. For hee affirmeth that it shall not onely winne the victorie in one or few battells, or against one onel blast, but also that it shall get the oun hande of the whole world, although it be a thousand times affailed.

22 There is another kinde of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the asssurednes of faith is so nothing at all dimmished, that thereby it is the more soundly stablisht. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lection for them to learne by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselues with the same offences: or recording with themselues their owne miserie, do learne to hang altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselues to be more fickle and sooner vanishing then any blast of winde. For when the Apostle, in setting forth the

the scourges wherewith the Lord in old time had punished the people of Israel, put the Corinthians in fear that they intangle not themselves with like evils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dunes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strengthened. And when he taketh occasion of the Jews fall to exhort him that standeth, to take heed that he fall not, he doth not thereby bid us to waver, as though we were not fully assured of our steadfastnes, but only he taketh away arrogant pretension and rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Jews, the Gentiles being received into their place, should not too much outrageously triumph against them. Albeit he speaketh there not only to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried onely in outward show. For neither doth he admonish everyie man particularly, but making a comparison betweene the Jews and the Gentiles, after that he had shewed that the Jews in this that they were rejected, did suffer just judgement for their unbelief and unthankfulness, he also exhorted the Gentiles that they should not, by being proud and extolling themselves, loose the grace of adoption lately conferred into them. But as in that general rejecting of the Jews: there remained yet some that were not fallen from the covenant of adoption, to out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed vp onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, and so abuse God’s loving kindness to their owne destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon shall follow no inconvenience. For it is one thing to holde downe the rash presumption which out of the remnants of the flesh creepeth sometime even into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outrageously wanton: and another thing to strike the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednes in the mercy of God.

23. Then, when he teacheth, that with feare and trembling we should worke our own salvation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustome vs with much abasing of our selves, reverently to looke vp into the mightines of God. For truly nothing doth so much awake vs to call all our confidence and assurance of minde upon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selves and carefulnes conceited by knowledge in conscience of our owne wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where he comely consigneth the boldnes of faith that leaneth upon God’s mercy with a reverent feare, which we must needs feele so oft as coming into the sight of God’s majestie, wee perceive by the glorious brightness thereof, how great is our owne filthines. And Solomon faith tuely, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne hart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into evil. But such feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not such whereby we should be troubled and utterly fall: euery such a feare as when the minde confounded in it selfe, doth recover it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it renueth by trust in him. Therefore there is no cause to the contrarie, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured comfort, in respect that sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanitie, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde upon the truth of God. But how will some man say shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? Even thus, as contrarily sensible dullnesse, and carefulnes. For whereas the wicked travaile to procure to themselfe a want of greese, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet the judgement of God so preffeth them, that they cannot attain that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that in fighting valiantly, they may restrain themselfes under the bridle of modestie. And by the proceffe of the text it appeareth, that this was the extent of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of feare, and trembling to be the good good pleasure of God, whereby he guie heth to them that be his both to will well, and voluntarily to go through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that saying of the Prophete: The children of Israel shall fear God and his goodnesse: be-cause notouless godlines engendreth the reverence of God, but the verie sweetenes and pleasant taste of grace, filleth man being discouraged in himselfe with feare and admiration, to make him hang upon God, and humblelie yeeld himselfe subject to his power.

24 Yet we hereby make roome to that most pestillent Philosophy, which many halfe papists at this day begin to come in corners. For, because they cannot defend that groffe doubtfulness which hath beene taught in Schooles, they flie to another deisme, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfulness. They confesse, that so oft as we looke vnto Christ, we finde in him full matter to hope well; but because we are alwaies vnwoorthie of those good things that are offered vs in Christ, they would have vs to wauer and stagger in beholding our owne vnwoorthines. Breelie, they place confidence no betweene hope and feare, that it althre from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courses: and they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is prested downe, when the one ariseth, the other agane falleth. So when Sathan fetheth that those open engines where-with before time he was wont to destroy the affuledning of faith, doe nowe nothing preualue, he endeavoureth by crooked understaminings to ouerthrowit. But what manner of confidence shall that be, which shall nowe & then yeld to desperation? If (by they) thou consider Christ, there is asurred salvation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is asurred damnation. Therefore of necessitye distrust and good hope must by enter-changeable courses raigne in thine minde: As though we ought to imagine Christ standing a farre off, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for salvation at his hande, not because he appeareth a farre off vnto vs, but because he hath graffed vs into his bodie, and so maketh vs partakers not onely of all his good things, but also of himselfe. Therefore I turne this their argument against themselves: if thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good things is by way of communicating to gieen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his rightousnesse drowned thy finnes, his salvation taketh away thy damnation: he by his woorthinesse commeth betweene thee and God, that thy vnwoorthiness come not in the sight of God. Breelie, this is the truth: we ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor from him, but with both handes to holde fast that fellowship whereby he hath coupled himselfe vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The bodie indeed (faith he) is dead by reason of sinne: but the spirite of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for rightouinesse. According to these mens trisling deisme he shoulde have faide, Christ indeed hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remaine subject to death and damnation. But he faith faire otherwisse. For he teacheth that that damnation which we descreue of our solues, is swallowed vp by the salvation of Christ: and to prooue it, he vifteth the same reason that I have allcaged, because Christ is not without us, but dwelleth within us, and cleaueth vnto vs not onely with undiuable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine maruellous communion daily more and more growth with vs into one bodie, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I de-niet not, as I have faide a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weakenesse thereof is among violent sodeine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke miste of tentation the light thereof is choked, but whatsoever happeneth, it cautheth not from endeouer to secke God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposly intreateth of this question in his fift Homilie in the dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I faie) by the the benefite of God studying upon the soule, mee thinke I finde in it two things as it were contrarie. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truly of it, than that it is vitally brought to naught. What neede I now to reckon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, couered with darknes, entangled with deceitful enticements, itching with lustes, subject to passions, filled with imaginings, alway inclined to culpe, bent to all kinds of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteous souls of it being looked upon by the light of truth be founden like a cloth stained with foures, then what shall the unrighteous soules thereof be accounted? If the light is in vs be darknes, how great is the very darknesse? What then? without doubt man is made like unto vanity: man is brought to naught; man is nothing. But how then is he vitally nothing whom God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, towards whom Gods hart is set? Brethren, let vs take hart againe. Though we benothing our owne hartes, peraduenture there may somewhat of vs lie hidden in the hart of God. Of father of mericenes? Of father of the miserable, how doth thou set thy hart toward vs? For thy hart is where thy treasur is. But how be we thy treasur, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Even before thee, not within thee, so in the judgement of thy truth, but not in the affecion of thy pite. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are nor, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of themselves, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the works of rightoufnesse, but of him that calleth. And then bee faith, that this coupling together of both considerations is marvellous. Truely those things that are knitt together, doth not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declareth in these words. Now if with both these considerations wee diligently look upon our felues what we bee, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke we glorifying our selves, to be tempered, but peraduenture it is more increaced. Truely it is perfectly stablisshed, that we glorie not in our felues but in the Lord. If wee thinke thus: If he hath determined to save vs we shall by and by be deliered: now in this we may take courage. But let vs clime vp into a higher watch tower, and seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I have not forgotten, but I say it with fear and reverence: we I say bee but in the hart of God. We be, but by his allowing as woorthy, not by our owne woorthinesse.

26. Now, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in every place witnesse is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisdom, and in some places wisdome it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double understanding: For God hath in himselfe the reverence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore he that will truly worship him, will endeavoure to shew himselfe both an obedient sonne and a servable servant unto him. The obedience that is given to him as to a father, the Lord by the Prophet calleth honour: the servise that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (faith he) honoreth the father, and the servent the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoever he puttheth difference betweene them, thou feelest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be vnto vs a reverence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one finde receive both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, if he hath cause enough, although there were no helles at all, why he should dread his displeasure more greatly then any death. But also (such is the wantonnesse of our flesh to run to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restraine the same by all means, we ought therewithall to take holde of of this thought, that the Lord under whose power we live, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in living wickedly do provoke his wrath against themselves.

27. But that which John faith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie casteth out feare, because feare conteneth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incur his displeasure, if they might do it without punishment; but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge; therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they think he it hageth over them, for that they looke every moment when it shall fall upon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is above saide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang over their necks, but they are made the more warie not to procure it. So faith the Apostle whoe speakeketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceived: for this commeth the wrath of God upon the children of vnbeliefe. He threateneth not that Gods wrath will come upon them, but putteeth them in mind to thinke upon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doings as he had receiued, that they themselfes should not be willing also to prove it. Albeit it seldom happeneth, that the reprobate be awakened with one and bare threatnings, but rather being already grosse and vnseene full with their owne hardines, so oft as God thundreth from heauen they harden themselves to obstinacy, but when they are once striken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a fentinell feare: and in comparison set it for contrary to frence natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other doe suddenly in a middle kind, because that same feruill and constrained affection sometime to subdue mens minde, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28. Now we understand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to have respect, the profession of salvation and eternall life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is favourable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assuredness of salvation, when he himselfe doth assure vs of his loue. Let him shew his face (faith the Prophet) and we shall be fafe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to be the summe of our salvation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs, there remaineth no perill, but that all things shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, having taken hold of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life, and of the life to come, and perfect assuredness of all good things: but that same fuche as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either the length or honor or wealth of his life, forasmuch as God willed none of these things to be appointed vnto vs, but is contented with this assuredness, that God will never fail how soever many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the chees assuredness of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of the word of God. But whatsouer miseries and calamities betide vs there with vs whome God loueth, they can not worke the contrary, but that his good will is perfect satisfie. Therefore when we did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, we named the fauour of God, out of which springe doe flowe vnto vs all kindes of good things. And this we may commonly note throughout the Scriptures, that whensoeuer mention is made not onely of eternall salvation, but also of any good thing in vs, we be at allways called backe to the loue of God. For which cause David saith, that the goodnesse of God when it Psal. 63.4. is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doe flowe vnto vs according to our owne willing, and wee bee uncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shall be accursed, and therefore miserable: But if the favourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, euens our very miseries shall be blessed, because they are turned to helpes of our saluation. As Paul, when he heareth vp a rehearfall of all aduersities, yet he glorifieth that he was not by them feuered from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alway beginneth at the favour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewise David setteth the onely favour of God against all the terrours that trouble vs. If (faith he) I shall walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes doe waue, vnlesse being contented with the favour of God, they seek their peace in it, and have this inwardly fixt in them that is faide in the Psalmes, Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord, and the nation whom he hath choen to him for his inheritance.

29 We make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of God, because faith properly staieth vpon it. For though faith doe beleue God to be true in all things, whether he command or forbidden, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently receiueth his commandements, and bewareth of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regarde to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not founde in commandements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely given. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne worke, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceive it to stande in our sches. Therefore if we will not haue our faith to tremble and waue, we must stay with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offered vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle bareth this witness of the Psalmes, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commandements and also from the promises of the law, because there is nothing that can stabilith faith, but that liberal endowment, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospel together, when he teacheth that the minifterie of the Gospel was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the fame is the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleueth: that in it is revealed the rightcousnesse of God from faith to faith. And no maruell. For faith the Gospel is the minifterie of reconciliation, there is no other testimonie sure enough of Gods good will towards vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, we doe not deny but that the faithfull doe everie way imbrace and receive the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Even as the faithfull ought in deedde to acknowledge God to be the judge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regard vnto his mercifull kindnesse: for as much as he is described to them to be confidered such a one as is louing and mercifull, farre from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle vnto all, powring forth his mercie vpon all his worke.

30 Neither yet doe I regard the barkings of Piggian, or such other dogs, when they finde fault with this refraint, as though in duiding faith it did take holde but of one pece thereof. I grant (as I haue already said) that the general object of faith (as they term it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put vs in hope of favour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the world, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatenings to bee excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeed true. But the caullers doe vniuallly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the word of God. For our meaning is onely to shew those two things, first, that faith neuer steadifieth standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to bee reconciled reconciled to God, but because it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those points are worthie to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betwene the children of God and the reprobate, betwene the faithful and the vnbeleeuing. If a man do beleue that God both justly commandeth all that he commundeth, and truly threatneth, shall he be therefore called faithful? Nothing leas. Therefore there can be no fastefaith stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercy of God. But now to what end do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of salvation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconvenience, if in the definition we do enforce the principal effect thereof, and doe joine vnto the generall name, in stead of a difference that maketh that weare the faithful from the vnbeleeuing. Finallie, the malicious haue nothing to find fault withall in this doctrine, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in the same blame, which calleth the Gospel properly the word of faith.

152 But heereupon againe we gather that which we haue before declared, that faith doth no leas neede the word than the fruit doth neede the huile roote of the tree, because no other (as David testifieth) can troue in the Lord, but they that knowe his name. But this knowledge is not according to euerie mans imagination, but so farre as God himselfe is witnesses of his owne goodness. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in an other place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy word. Againe, I haue trusted in thy word, saue me. Where is to be noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the mean time we doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, vnlesse faith sustaine it selfe, it can never give vnto God his due honor. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that he beleued that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I haue beleued, and I am sure that he is able to kepe that which I haue left with him vntill that day. But if a man wery with himselfe: how many doubtings of the power of God doe ofteentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall well perceive that they, which do higlie esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a little profited in faith. We all will confess, that God is able to do whatsoever he will, but when euen the least tentation throweth vs downe with fear, and amaleth vs with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Godes power, when we prefer above it those things, that Sathan threateneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esay, meaning to print into the harts of the people the assurance of saluation, doth so honorable in retract of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how maruellously the Lord governeth the frame of Heaven and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is heere nothing that seemeth not fitly for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to do all things be presently set before our eyes, our cares will hardly heare the word, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, heere is declared his effectuall power, because godlineesse (as we haue already shewed in an other place) doth alway apply the power of God to vs and worketh speacially it setteth before it selfe those workes of God, whereby he hath testi-fieth himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might have learned that God which was once the author of saluation, will be an everlasting preferuer thereof. And David puttheth vs in minde by his owne example, that those be-nefities which God hath particularly bestowed vpon every man, doe afterward autaile to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to haue forlaken vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his ancient benefits may recomfovs, as it is said in another Psalm, I have beene mindfull of olde daies. I have studied vpon all thy workes, &c. Againe, I will remember the worikes of the Lorde, and his manuels from the beginning. But because without the worde all quickly vaniseth away that we conceiue of the power of God and of his workes, therefore we doe not without cause affirm that there is no faith, vnlesse God grove light vnto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be moued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it seemeth with zeale of faith, pasled beyond the bounds of the word. Sara, when she frequentedly desired the promised issue, gave her bondmaidie to her husband. It cannot bee denied but that these many waies finned; but now I touch onely this faile, that being carried away with her zeale, she did not restraine her selfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certaine that that deere proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by euill craftie means: she daunted her husband the winne and minister of the grace of God: she compell ed her sonne to lie: she by divers guiles and deceites corrupted the truth of God: Finally, in making a scorne of his promise, she did as much as in her lay, destroy it. And yet this act, how much fouer it was euill, and worthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessary that she should overcom many offences, that she might so earnestly endeavoure to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and dangers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarch Iacob was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the yeonger sonne, yet ceased not to be more favourably bent to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truth these examples doe teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it be a true faith, hath alway the upper hande. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make vioide the effect of the blessing, so neither did it make vioide her faith which generally raigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that doing. Neuerthelesse therein Rebecca uttered how ready mans minde is to fall so soone as he giueth hyselfe, neuer so little libertie. But though mans default and weakeesse doth darken faith, yet it doth not quench it: in the meantime it putteth vs in minde, how carefully we ought to hang vpou the mouth of God, and also confirmeth that which we have taught, that Faith vaniseth away, vnlesse it be uphelden by the Worde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Iaac and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wanderings out of the way, vnlesse they had beeene by Gods secrete bridle holden in obedience of the worde.

32 Againe, not without cause we include all the promisses in Christ, for as much as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospel: and in another place he teacheth, that all the promisses of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is ready to be shewed. For if God promiseth any thing, he therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promisse of his, that is not a testimonie of his loue. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continuall benefites of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, do thereby wrap themselves in so much the more grecious judgement. For if they doe not acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they doe not with themselves consider his goodnesse, therefore they cannot thereby be better taught of his mercy then brut beasts, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receive the same fruite of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doth it any more make against vs, that many times in refuing the promisses appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to themselves the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promisses doe then onely appeare, when they haue found faith with vs, yet the force and natural propertie of them is never extinguisht by our vnbeliefe or vnthankfulness. Therefore Therefore when the Lord by his promises doth provoke man not only to receive, but also to think upon the fruits of his bountifulness, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his love. Whereupon we must returne to this point, that every promise is a testifying of God's love to vs and vs. But it is out of question, that no man is loved of God but in Christ, he is the beloved son, in whom the love of the father abideth and refleeth, and then from him pouereth it selfe abroad vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that we have obtained favour in the beloved one. Therefore it must needs be derived and come vnto vs by meanes of him. For this cause the Apostle in another place calleth him our peace: in another place he feteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindnes bound vnto vs. It followeth then that we must cast our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs. And that Paul teacheth no absurditie, that all God's promises whatsoever they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There bee certaine examples that make for the contrarie. For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the Prophet the manner how to worship God almightie was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlines was praises. Cornelius a Gentile and a Roman, could scarcely understand that which was known not to all the Jews, yea and that very darkly; yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the sacrifice of Naaman, by the prophets answere allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whom Philip was caried, which if he had not had some faith, would not haue taken vpon him the trauell and expenses of so long a journey, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, how he bewaied his ignorance of the Mediator. And truly I grant that their faith was partly unexpressed, not onely concerning Christs person, but also concerning his power & the office committed vnto him of the father. Yet in the meane time it is certaine, that they were instructed in such principles, as gave them some taste of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither would the Eunuche haue come in haste to Jerusalem from a farre countrey, to worship an unknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Jewish religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had bin too fond an aburditie for Ehreus when he taught him of small things, to haue faide nothing of the principal point. Therefore although there were among them a darke knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vs themselues in the sacrifices of the law, which must haue been discerned by the very end of them, that is Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare and outward declaration of the word of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it to be beleued, if our owne blindness and stubbornesse did not withstand it. But our mind hath such an inclination to vanitie, that it can never cleaue fast vnto the truth of God, and hath such a dulnes, that it is alway blinde and cannot see the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing anaylable done by the word without the enlightning of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is far aboue mans understanding. Neither that it be sufficient that the mind be lightned with the spirit of God, yet the heart be also strengthened and stablished with his power. Wherein the schoolemen do altogether err, which in considering of faith do onely take holde of a bare and simple affent by knowledge, leaving out the confidence and assurance of the heart. Therefore faith is both waies a singular gift of God, both that the mind of man is cleansed to taste the truth of God, & that his heart is stablished therein. For the holy Ghost not onely is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees increaseth it, vntil by it the bringing vs to the heauenly kingdom. That good thing ( faith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But how Paul faith that the holy Ghost is given by the hearing of faith, we may easily diffilute it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had beene an absurdity for him to call the holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author and cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherewith God garnisht his Church, and by encreasings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no marvell if he ascribeth those things to faith which maketh vs fit to receiue them. This is reckoned a most strange conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whom it is given, can believe in Christ. But that is partly because they do not consider either how secret and high the heavenly wisdom is, or how great mans dulnes is in conceiving the mysteries of God: and partly because they fooke not vnto that affidured and fastfult constanctnes of heart, that is to say, the chief part of faith.

34. But if (as Pauuie preacheth) no man is witnesse of the will of man, but the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the will of God? And if the truth of God be uncertaine among vs, in those things that we presently behold with our eyes, how should it be asuised and fastfult among vs there where the Lord promiseth foule things as neither eie seeth, nor wit comprehended? But herein mans sharpnes of understanding is so ouerthrown and faileth, that the fift degree of profiting in Gods schoole, is to forfake his owne wit. By for it as by a veile cast before vs, we are hindered that we cannot attaine the mysteries of God, which are not discloased but to little ones. For neither doth flesh and blood disclose nor natural man perceiue those things that are of the spirit, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be judged. Therefore herein the helpe of the holy Ghost is necessarie, or rather herein his force onely raingeth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath beeene his counsellor: but the holy spiritte searcheth out all things, euen the deepe secretes of God, by whom it is brought to passe, that we know the minde of Christ. No man (faith he) can come to me: vnlesse my father that sent me, draw him. Every one therefore that hath heard and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seen the father, but he that is sent of God. Even as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but being drawn by the spiritte of God: so when we be drawen, we are lifted vp in wit and minde aboue our understanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a new sharptnes of understanding, wherewith it may beholde heavenly mysteries, with brightness whereof it was before dazed in it selfe. And so mans understanding receiuing brightness by the light of the holy Ghost, doth newe till then truly begin to taste of those things that belong to the kingdom of God, being before altogether vnacquainted and without judgement of taste to take alay of them. Therefore when Christ did not only set our vs, two of his discipules the mysteries of his kingdom, yet he nothing pruaded, vnlesse he opened their senses that they might understand the Scriptures. When the Apollines were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spiritte of Truth must bee sent vnto them, to powre into their minde the same doctrine which they had heerd with their eares. The worde of GOD is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whom it is preache, but no profit among blinde men. But we are all in this behalfe blind by nature, therefore it cannot pierce into our mind but by the inwarde matter the holy Ghost, making by his enlightening an entrie for it.

35. In another place, when we had to entreate of the corruption of nature, we have more largely sween that vsint men are to beleue. Therefore I will not weare the readers with repeating the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spiritte of faith is called of Pauuie faith it selfe, which the spiritte giveth vs, but not which we have naturally. Therefore he praieth that God fulfull in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giveth it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans owne motion: and not consented therewith

therewith he addeth further; that it is a declaration of God’s power: writing to the Corinthians, where he faith, that faith hangeth not upon the wisdom of men, but is grounded upon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh indeed of outward miracles: but because the reprobate are blinde at the beholding of them, hee comprehendeth also that inward feale, whereof he maketh mention in another place. And God, the more gloriously to fet forth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchefaeth not to graunt it to all univerfally without difference, but by singular prudelge giueth it to whom he will. For proofe wherof we have alleaged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithful expoundere, crieth out that it would please the Saviour to teach him, and that the very beleewing it seflfe, is of gift and not of deserving. Non man (faith he) commeth to me, were it not my father draw him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two do heare, the one defpiseth, the other afdendeth vp. Let him that defpiseth, impute it to himselfe: let him that afdendeeth, not arrogantlie alligne it to himselfe. In another place. Why is it giuen to one and noto to another? If it giueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the croffe. Out of I wrote not what depth of the judgements of God which wee may not search proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, fauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, & not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the croffe. I may crye out with wondering, but not thew it in disputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when hee enlighteneth vs vnto faith by the power of his Spirit, doth therewithal graffe vs into his body, that we may be made partakers of all good things.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may be further conuerted into the hart. For the word of God is not throughly receiued by faith, if it swimme in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken route in the bottome of the hart, that it may be an inciniblence to beare and repulse all the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true understanding of the minde is the enlightening thereof, then in such confirmation of the hart, his power much more evidentlie appeareth, even by so much as the difficulties and the blindnes of the wit; and as it is harder to have the minde furnished with afflicted, then the wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seal, to seale vp in our harts those same promises, the assurance whereof is first imprinted in our wit, and serveth for an earnest to conforme and fulfill them. Sith yee beleued (faith the Apostle) yee are seale vp with the holy Spirit of promife, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the Spirit the harts of the faithful are grauen as with seale, and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promife, because he ratificeth the Gospell vnto vs? Like wise to the Corinthians he faith: God which annointed vs, which hath also seale vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our hart. And in another place when he speaketh of confidence and boldnesse of hoping well, hee maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37 Neithere yet have I forgotten that which I faide before, the remembrance whereof experience continually renueth, that is, that faith is rotted with divers doubts, so that the minde of the godly are seldom quiet, or at leaft do not alway enjoy a peaceable state: but with whatsoever engine they be shaken, either they rie vp of the very gulf of temptations, or do abide fast in their standing. Truly this assurance onely nourishteth & defendeth faith, when we hold fast that which is faide in the Pfalme. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore wee will not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leape into the hart of the Sea. Also this most sweete quietnesse is spoken of in another place: I laie downe and slept, and rose again, because the Lord hath fustained me: it is not meant thereby that David was alway with one undisturbed course framed to a merry cheer—fulnesse: but in respect that he taatid the grace of God according to his proportion of Faith, therefore he glorified that he without s ear are despiseth all that can might disquiet the peace of his minde. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to Faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Ecc. it is said: In hope and silence, shall be your strength. In the Psalme: Hold thee still in the Lord, and wait for him. Wherewith agreeeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrews: Patience is needfull, &c.

38 Hereby we may judge how preffuent is that doctrine of the Scholemen, that we can no otherwaise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by moral conciecture as every man thinketh himselfe worthy of it. Truly if we shall weigh by our owner how God is minded toward vs, I grant that we can attaine it with any conciecture, be it never so slender: but faith God ought to have relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall we be armed, if we say that God is favourable unto vs vpon this condition, to that the purenes of our life do determe it? But because I have appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speak no more of them at this present, specially as much as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrarie to Faith, than either conciecture or any thing nearre vs doubting. And they doe very ill-writte to this purpose that testimony of the Preacher which they have oft in their mouths: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or love. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the commo translation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such words: that is, that if any man will judge by the present state of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loveth, he laboureth in vaine, and troubleth himselfe to no profit for his pains: for all things happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alwayes wittes his loue to them to whom he maketh all things happen prosperously, nor doth alwaies witt the hatred to them whom he punisheth. And that he doth to condemn the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in things most needful to be knowen: as he had written a little before, that it cannot be discerned what the soule of man doth differeth from the soule of a beast, because it feemeth to die in like manner: If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we hold of the immortalitie of soules standeth vpon conciecture: may he not worthilie be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wis which gather that there is no certaintie of Gods grace, because we can conceive none by the carnall beholding of present things?

39 But they alledge that it is a point of rash presumptioun, to take vpon vs an undoubted knowledge of Gods will. I would notlee grant it vnto them, if we did take so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God ubiect to the flenderenesse of our witte: But when we simply say with Paul, that we have receivd not the Spirit of this world, but the Spirtie that is of God, by whose teaching we may know those things that are given vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderousely speake against the Spirtie of God? But if it be a horrible robberie of God to accuse the revelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassurrd or vn doubtfull, what doe we offend in affirming that it is aslered? But they say, that this ano is not without great presumptuousnesse that we dare so glory of the Spirtie of Christ. Who would thinke that their dulnesse were so great that were committed matters of the world, that they say fowull tumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vntles their own writings that are abroad did tellus it. Paul pronounceth that they only are the children of God, that are mooned with his Spirtie: and the men would have them that be the children of God, to be mooned with their owne Spirtie, and to be without the Spirtie of God. Paul teacheth that we call God, our Father, as the holy Ghost ministreth that word vnto vs, which onely can beare witness to our Spirtie that we we are the children of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vs God, yet doe take away his Spirit, by whose guiding he should have beene rightlie called vs. Paul denieth that they are the servants of Christ, that are not moved with the Spirit of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirit of Christ. Paul makest no hope of the bleffed resurrection, vnlesse we feeke the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without any fuch feeling. But peradventure they will answere, that they doe not deny that we ought to bee endued with it, but that it is a point of modellie and humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the Faith, to prove themselves whether they haue Christ, whom vnlesse a man doe acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath giuen (Faith John) we know that he abideth in vs. And what doe we else buut call the promises of Christ in doubt, when we wil be counted the servants of God without his Spirit, which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out vs vs all his? Beside that, we doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him, Faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lefons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindness, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glory of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorifying Christians it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truly Christ said, that his Spirit is unknown to the world, and is onely known of them with whom he abideth. 40 And because they will not goe about to overthrow the fidedifffnffe of Faith, with digging onely of one mine, they affaile it also otherwise. For they fay, that although according to our present state of righteoufnesse, we may gather a judgment of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perfeuerance to the ende abideth in suffence. A goodly confidence of saluation forsooth is left vs, if we judge by morall conjecture, that for a present moment we be in favour, and what shall become of us to morow we cannot tell. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwife: I am surelie persuaded (Faith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalties, nor death nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall ouer vs from the loue wherewith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seek to escape with a trisling solution, prating that the Apostle had but by speciall revelation but they are holden too hard to fly away. For there he entreteth of those good things that commonly come by Faith to the Faithfull, not those that he himselfe specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weakenes and vnstedfastnesse: Let him that feareth (Faith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby we should be ouerthrown, but whereby we may leere to humble our selves under the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and truth is it to limit the assurednes of faith to a moment of time, whose propietie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Sith therefore the Faithfull doe impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his Spirit they doe by Faith enjoy the beholding of the heavenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuoufnesse, that if any man be ashamed to confess it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfуlnes, in vnkindly hidding Gods goodnes, than he doth declare his modestie or submiffion. 41 Because it seemed that the nature of Faith could nor otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substance of the promise vs. Which it refteth as upon his proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, Faith by and by fallith downe or rather vanifheth away: therefore we took our definition from thence, which yet varyeth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he faythat Faith is a substance of things to be hoped for, and a certaintie of things that are not seene. For by this word substance (for that terme he vseth) he meaneneth as it were, an upholding

Cap. 2. Of the manner how to receive faith, whereupon the godly mind leanteth and resteth. As if he should say that faith is a certaine and assured possession of those things that are promis'd vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for assiance, which I mistike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonly received. Againe, to signifie that even to the last day when the books shalbe opened, they are higher then those things that may be perceived with our senses, or leene with our eyes, or handled with our hands, and that the same are no otherwise poss'd by vs, but if we goe beyond the capacity of our owne wit, and bend our understanding about all things that are in the world, yea and clime about our felune, he hath therefore added that this assurednes of possession, is of those things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seen. For plaine appearance (as Paul writheth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaine or proofs (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a conjunction of things not present: for in Grecian it is Elenchos, he saith as much as if he did say, that it is an evident shewing of things not appearing, a seewing of things not seen, a plaine sense of dark things: a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they be that pertaine to our salvation, cannot be seen in themselves, and in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whom truely we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as were already done and fulfilled. But how can the mind lift vp it selfe to receive such a sight of Gods goodness, but that it must needs be therewith wholly kindled to love God againe? For that flowing plente of sweetnes which God hath laid vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truly known, but that it must therewithall vehemently move affection: and whose affection on it once moueth, it verely raughtheth and carrieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no manuelke, if into a perfeite and crooked heart neuer entereth this affection, by which being conuerted vp into the very heauen, we are suffered to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of God, and the most sacred prayy places of his kingdom, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an vnconceived heart. For that which the Schooleme teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a mere madness. For it is faith onely that first engendreth charitie in vs,

Hope an undidable companion of faith.

42. Now wherefore this luisely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternall salvation, as an undiable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it forth out of itselfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriously fuent we talk of faith, yet we are compelled to have no faith at all. For faith (as is above saied) be an assured perswasion of Gods truth, that it cannot lie vnto vs not deceiving vs, nor becoming void, then they that have conceived this assurance, trulie doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God will performe his promisses, which in their perswasion cannot be but true; so that briefly, hope is nothing els, but a looking for those things which faith had beleued to be trulie promised of God. So faith beleueth that God is true, hope looketh for the performance

performance of his truth in convenient time. Faith believeth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shew himself such a one toward vs. Faith believeth that etemal life is given vs, hope looketh that it be one day revealed. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nouriseth and sustainteth faith. For as no man can looke for anie thing at Gods hand, but he that hath first believed his promises: so againe the weakeless of our faith must with patient hope and expectation be sustainted and cherished, that it fall not as fainting for weariness. For which reason Paul doth well place our salutation in hope. For hope, while in silence, looketh for the Lord, restrainteth faith that it fall not headlong with too much haste: hope strengtheneth faith, that it waue not in Gods promises, nor begin to doubt of the truth of them: hope refresheth faith that it waxe not weare: Hope stretcheth faith to the vertemost bound, that it faint not in the mid course, nor in the vertic beginning. Finally, hope by continually renuing and restoring, it maketh it now and then to rife vp frether than itselfe to continuance. But how many waies the helps of hope are necessarie to the strengthening of faith, shall better appeare, if we consider with how manie sorts of temptations they are afflicted and shaken, that have embraced the word of God. First, the Lord in deferring his promises dooth oftentimes holde our minde longer in suspenfe than we would with; here it is the office of hope to performe, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises do tary, yet we should wait still for them. Sometime he suffereth vs not onely to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeased: here it is much more necessarie to have hope to help vs, that according to the saying of another Prophet, we may still looke for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Jacob. There rife vp all corners (as Peter faith) that ask: where is his promise of his comming? for as much as since the fathers slept, all things so continue from the beginning of the creation. Yeas the flesh and the world do whisper the same thing in our ears. Heere must faith stayed with suffrance of hope be holden fast fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thousand yeres like as one day.

43 For this conjoining and alliance the Scripture sometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preferred through faith, vnto the disclosinge of saluation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fully agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we have already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment and strength of faith. Sometimes they are joyned together as in the same Epistle. That your faith and hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith desirous expectation, because in patiency hoping, we hold our desires in suspens, till Gods convenient oportunitie be open. All which matter we may better understand by the 10. chapter to the Hebrues, which I haue already alledged. Paul in an other place, although he speake vnproperly, yet meaneth the same thing in these words: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteouines, ete because we embracing the testimonie of the Gospel concerning his free loue, do looke for the time when God shall openie shew that which is now hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard laish two foundations of hope, that is the grace of God, and the defearing of works. Hope canne have no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: and we haue already declared that faith hath one only marke the mercie of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a lively reaion he bringeth. If (faith he) thou darrest hope for any thing without deseruing, that shalt not be worthie to be called hope, but presumptio. Who (gentle reader) will not worthily abhorre such beastis, that say, it is arith and, presumptuous deedes, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his word? For where the Lorde will eth vs to looke for all things at his goodness, they faine it is presumptio to leave and rest vpon it. A maister meece for such schollers as he found in the mad scoole of filthie bablers. But as for vs, when wee see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceive a hope of saluation, let vs gladly presume so much vpon his truth, as triuing vs his only mercy, casting away the confidence of works, to be bold to hope well. He will not deceiue that said: Be it vnto you according to your faith.

The iiij. Chapter.
That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

A lbeit we haue already partly taught how faith posteth faith Christ, & how by it we enjoy his benefites: neuerthelesse this were yet darke, vntele we did also make declaration of the effects that we feele thereby. Not without cause it is said, that the summe of the Gofpell standeth in repentance and in forrengues of sinnes. Therefore leaving out these two points, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shall be but a hun-grie and vnperfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forsomuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and we obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newenesse of life and free reconciliacion, reason and order of teaching required, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shall be to Repentance, because when this article is well perceiued, it shall the better appear how man is justified by onely faith and meere pardon, and yet how real hollines of life (as I may so call it) is not feuered from free imputation of righteouenes.
Now it ought to be out of question, that repentance doth not onely immediately follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon and forrengues is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gofpell, that the sinner being deliucred from the ty-rannie of Satan, from the yoke of sin, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdome of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gofpell, but he must returne from the errours of his former life into the righte way, and apply all his studie to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather goe before faith than flowe or spring forth of it, as a fruit out of a tree, they never knew the force thereof, and are mooved with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2 Chrif (say they) and Iohn in their preachings do first exhort the people to repentance, and then they afterward saye that the kingdome of heauen is at hande.
Such commandement to preache, the Apostles received, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the joyning together of yllables, they marke not in what meaning the words hang together. For when the Lord Christ and Iohn do preache in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hande: do they not fetch the caufe of repentance from verie grace and promifie of saluation? Therefore their words are as much in effect as if they had faide: because the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hande, therefore repent ye. For Matthew when he hath shewed that Iohn fo preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophecie of Iesai, concerninge the voice crying in the wildernesse. Prepare the waie of the Lorde, make straight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort & glad rydings. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dream of a certayne weane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out, but we meane to shew that a man cannot carnestly apply himselfe to repentance, vnlesse he know himselfe to be of God. But no man is truely perswaded that he is of God, but he that hath first received his grace.
But these things shall be more plainly discussed in the proceffe following. Peradnunture this deceived them, that many are first by terrours of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they have thorougly digested, yea before they have gafted the knowledge of grace. And this is the space at the beginning, which some.
Some account among vertues, because they feem that it is neede to true and just obedience. But our question is not heere how diversly Christ draweth vs vnto hym, or prepareth vs to the endevoure of godliness: onely this I say, that there can be no vp-rightnes found where regneth not the Spirit which Christ received to communci-cate the fame to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalmes: With thee is nicercfulness, that thou maieft be feared, no man shall euereuerently fear god, but he that truutheth that God is merceuall vnto hym: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the lawe, but hee that is persuaded that his seruices please him: which tendernes in pardoning and bearing with faults, is a signe of fatherly favoure. Which is also thowed by that exhortation of Sow: Come let vs returne to the Lord,because hee hath plucked vs and he will heale vs: hee hath striken vs, and he will cure vs, because the hope of pardon is vfed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their sinnes. But their doing error is without all colour of reason, which to begin at repentance do appoint certaine daies to their newe concourses, during the which they must exercice themselves in penance: and when those daies are once pafft, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospell. I speake of many of the Anabaptistes, specially those that maruellouslie rejoice to be counted spiritually, and their companions the Lefuites, & such other dregs. Such fruits fortooth that spirit of gudinesse beingeth forth, to determine repentance within compass of a fewe daies, which a Christian man ought to extende in continuance throughout his whole life.

3 But certaine learned men, even long before these times, meaning to speake simply and sincerely of repentance, according to the truth of Scripture, have faide that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and vniuificacion. Mortification they expound to be a sorrowe of the soule and scared cowse of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the judgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then hee truely begins to hate and abhorre sinne: then hee hartily melteth himselfe, confesseth himselfe to bee miserable and loft, and witheth himselfe to bee an other man. Further, when hee is touched with some feeling of the judgement of God (for the one immediately followeth vpon the other) then he lieth striken and overthrowne, then he trembleth, humbled and called downe, then he is discouraged and despaireth. This is the first part of repentance, which they have commonly called contrition. Vniuificacion they expound to bee the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man overthrowne with conscience of sinne, and striken with feare of God, looking afterward vnto the goodness of God, vnto the mercy, favour and saluation, that is through Christ, affeth vp himselfe, taketh breath againe, receueth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And these words, if they haue a right explication, doe aptly enough express the nature of repentance. But where they take Vniuificacion for the cheerefulnesse, which the munde receueth being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: forasmuch as it rather signifieth a desire to bee holy and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were faide, that man dieth to himselfe, to begin to live to God.

4 Some other, because they haue this worde diversely taken in Scripture, haue made two sortes of repentance: and because they should make them differentely known by some marke, they haue called one repentance of the law, by which the sinner wounded with the feaing iron of sinne, and worne away with feare of the wrath of God, stiekeft fast in that trouble and cannot winde himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospell, by which the sinner is indeed greevouslie vexed with himselfe, but hee isteth vpon higher and taketh hold of Christ, the falue of his fowe, the comfort of his feare, the bauen of his miserie. Of the Repentance of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Indas. Whose repentance when the Scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greeiouslie

Two kindes of repentance, the one of the Lawe, the other of the Gospell nefle of their sinne, were afraid of the wrath of God, but in thinking upon God oneyly as a reuenger and Judge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entrance of hell, whereunto they being entred into this present life, began already to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maieftie. The repentance of the Gospell, we see in all them, that being galled with the spurre of sinne in themselues, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lord. Exod. was triued with feare, when he received the message of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, he tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Nimmites were troubled with the horrible threatning of destruction. But they, clothed themselves in sackcloth and ashes and prayed, hoping that the Lord might be turned to them and turned from the furor of his wrath. David confessd that he had too much sinned in numbing the people: but he said further, Lord take away the wickednes of thy servant. He acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, and did cast himselfe downe before the Lord, but therewithal he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their hart, but trufting vpon the goodness of God, they said furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we doe? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeed bitterly, but he ceasst not to hope well.

5 Although all these things be true, yet the very name of repentance (so far as I can learne by the Scriptures) is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend Faith vnder repentance, it disagreeth with that which Paul faith in the Aetes, that he testieth to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and Faith in Jesus Christ, where he recketh repentance and Faith as two divers things. What then? Can true repentance fland without Faith? No: But though they cannot be seuered, yet they must be distinguished. As Faith is not without hope, and yet Faith and Hope are divers things: so repentance and Faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bond, yet they rather would be confounded than consouled. And true-ly I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof Faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easly appeare when the force and nature thereof shall be declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is derived of converting or returning, in Grecke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing is felte doth not ill agree with either derivations, whereof the name is, that we departing from our sclices shold turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, should put on a new. Wherefore in my judgement, repentance may thus not amisse be defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest fear of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the old man, and in the quickening of the Spirit. In this sense are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophets in old time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onely thing they trauelled to perswade,that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lords judgement, they should fall downe and be humbled before him, against whom they had ofsended, and with true amendment returne into his right way. Therefore these words, To be turned or returne vnto the Lord, To repent, or doe penance, are among them vfd without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the two holy history faith, that men repent after the Lord, when they that lided wanttonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe begin to follow his word, and are readie at their captains commandement to goe whither he calleth them.
And John and Paul vied these words, to bring forth fruttes worthy of repentance, for, to lead such a life as may represent and testimone such an amendment in all their doings.

For though man's life were absolutely furnished with all points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may indeed be praised of the world, but in heaven it shall be mere abomination, forasmuch as the chief part of our righteousness is to give God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our faces to yeeld vs subject to his government.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is ment by this that we faie, that a repentance consisteth in two parts, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickening of the spirit. The Prophets do plainly express it, although somewhat simplic and grofily according to the capacitie of the carnall people, when they say: Ceafe euill, and do goodnes. Againe: Be walshe, be cleane, take away the eul of your works from mine eyes: Ceafe to do peruerfly, learn to do well, seeke judgement, help the opprefled, &c. For when they call men away from wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednes and peruerfenesse. It is in deed an vnseafe and hard thing to put off our faces, and to depart from our natural disposition. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly dead, vnlesse all that we haue of our faces be abolifhed. But forasmuch as all the affections of the flesh is enemie against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they express the renuing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteousnesse, judgement, and mercy. For it were not enough to doe those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the hart have first put on the affecti on of rightouesnesse, judgement, and mercy. That is done when the spirit of God hath so loked in newe thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holi neffe, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truely as we are naturally turned away from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our faces doe go before, we can never go toward that which is right. Therefore wee are so oft commanded to put off the old man, to forsake the world and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, and to be renued in the spirit of our minde. Moreover the very name of mortification doth put vs in minde how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we thereby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the fleare of God, for doe learn the principles of godlines, but when we are violently flaine with the word of the spirit, and so brought to naught euem as though God shou'd pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

9 Both these things do happen vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we doe truly communicate of his death, by the power wereof our old man is crucifed, & the body of sin dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may liue no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection by it we are raised vp into a newenes of life, that may agree with the rightouesnesse of God. In one word I expound repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adam offence s, slyly defaced & in a maner utterly blotted out, may be renued in vs. So the Apoiffe teacheth when he faith: but wee reprefenting the glorie of God with vncovered face are transformed into the fame image, out of glorie into glorie, as by the spirit of the Lord. Againe: Be ye renued in the spirit of your minde and put on the new man, which is created according to God in rightou sness and holinesse of truth, Againe in another place: putting on the newe man, which is renued after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration we be by the benefit of Christ restored into the rightouesnesse of God, fro which we were fallen by Adam. After which maner it pleareth the Lord wholly to restore all those whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yeare, but by continual, yea and sometimes slowe proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, cleath them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renuing all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselves all their their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdness of that filthy raile and apostata Staphylus, which foolishly layeth that I confound the state of this present life with the heavenlie glory, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holiness and true righteousness. As though when anie thing is defined, we should not fecke the whole fulneffe and perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increas; but I say that now neere any man approcheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run all their life long.

10 The children of God therefore are so delivered by regeneration from the bondage of sin, not that having now obtained the full possession of libertie, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should have remaining a continuall matter of strife, wherewith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learn their owne weakenes. And in this point all writers of sound judgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of euill, from whence continually spring desires that allure and stir him to sin. They confess also that the holy ones are still so holden intangled with that disease of lufting, that they cannot withdraw, but sometimes they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to coudtousneffe, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needfull to labour much in searching what the old writers have thought herein, forasmuch as onlie Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their judgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certaintie as they shall desire to learne of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to be this difference betwene him and vs, that he when he granteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lusts, that they cannot but lust, yet darest not call that disease sin, but being content to express it by the name of weaknesse, he teacheth that then only it becomes sin, when either voluste or consent is added to conceit or receiuing, that is, when will yeldeth to the first desire: but we account the very same for sin, that man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God, yea we affirm that the very corruption that ingendreth such desires is sin. We teach therefore that there is alwaies sin in the holy ones vntill they be unclothed of the mortall bodie, because there remaineth in their flesh the puerilenesse of lufting that fighteth against vertuynesse. And yet he doth not alway forbear to vs the name of Sinne, as when he faith: This Paul calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all sinnes vnto a fleshlie concupiscence. This as much as pertaineth to the holy ones, looketh the kingdom in earth, and perisheth in heaven. By which words he confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sinne, insuflie as they are subject to the lustes of the flesh.

11 But this that is snde, that God purgeth his Church from all sinne, that he promiseth that grace of deliverance by baptism, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we referre rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the very matter of sinne. God truely performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdom of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the upper hand and are conquerours in the battell) but it causeth only to reigne and not to dwell in them. Therefore we so say, that the olde man is crucified, and the lawe of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauings, not to have dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenes. And wee confess that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but we affirm that this commeth to passe by the mercie of God, that the holy ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should luste be reckoned sinners and guilty before God. And this sentence it shall not be hard for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are euident testimonies of the Scripture upon their their matter. For what would we have more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romans Chapter 7. First both we haue in another place shewed, and Augustine prooueth by strong reasons, that Paul there speake in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that he vieth these words Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not cauall against those words, but who can deny, that a straining against the Law of GOD is cuill, who can deny a withstanding of Justice to be finne? Finally, who will not grant that there is a spiritual misery? But all these things are reported of this diseafe by Paul. Againe, we have an assured demonstration by the Law, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For we are commanded to loue GOD with all our soules, with all our members, with all our powers. Suth all the partes of our Soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the Commandement that conceiue in their hart any desire be it never so little, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie. For what are not these the powers of the Soule, to be affected with odious motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these doe open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euen so much void of the loue of God? Wherefore, who so confeffeth not that all the luft of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same diseafe of lustfull, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, he must needs deny that the transgression of the Law is sinne.

12 If any man thinke it an absurditie, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally moued in affection, are univerally condemned, whereas they be put into man by GOD the Author of nature. We anfwere, that we do not condemned those desires that GOD hath so engraven into the minde of man at the first Creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the very nature of man, but onely outrageous and unbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of GOD. But now if by reason of the peruerse motions of nature all hir powers are infected and corrupted, that in all hir doings appeareth a continuall disorder and intemperance, because the desires cannot be suedered from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in few words) we teach that all the desires of men are cuill: and we accuse them to be guiltie of sinne, not in that that they are naturally, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt and uncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometyme forbeareth to vilifie the name of sinne. Yet where he writeth that the Law of sinne still remaining in the holy ones, the onely guiltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We will allledge some other sentences, whereby shall better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Julian: This Law of sinne is both releaved by the spirituall regeneration, and abideth in the mortall flethe, releaved herein, because the guiltines is taken away in the Sacrament whereby the faithful are regenerate: and it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithful do fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sin (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is releaved in baptism, but not ended. Againe, The law of sinne (of which yet remaining the guiltines, is in baptism discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flethe to luft against the spirit. Againe, Sinne is dead in respect of the guiltines wherein it held vs, & euen being dead, it still rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of burial. And yet plainer in the fifth booke. As the blindness of hart is both a sinne, whereby man beleeueth not in GOD: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud hart is chastised with worthy correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a base heart: so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sin, because there is in it disobedience against the government of the mind; and also the punishment of sinne, because it is given for recompence to the deseruings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he confereth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Here, without any doubtfull speech he calleth it sinne, because when error was once overthrown, and the truth confirmed, he lesse feared slanderous reports. As in the 41. Homily upon John, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his mind, he faith: If in the flesh thou ferue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himself faith: let not sinne reigne in your mortal bodie to obiece the desires thereof. He faith not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needs be in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defend that lust is no sinne, are woont to object that saying of James: Lust, after that it hath conceived, bringeth forth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnlesse we thinke that he speaketh of one ill works or actual sinnes, euill will it selve, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth michiuous deeds and wicked offences the offprings of sin, and giueneth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euill thing and damnable before God.

14 Certaine Anabaptists in this age, deuide I wote not what phrontike temperance in stead of spirituall regeneration: laying that the children of God restored into the state of innocency, now ought no more to be caerefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they neuter goe out of the waie. It were incredible that men minde could fall to so great madness, vnlesse they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truly it is monstrous. But it is mette that such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnes, that so have peruwaded their minds to turne the truth of God into a lie. Shall all the choyce of honestie and diuinelie, right and wrong, good and euill, vertue and vice, be taken away? Such difference (as they) commeth of the cursednes of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So now there shall be no difference between fornication and chastitie, plaine dealing and sutlelie, truth and lying, justice and extortion. Take away these faire, by they, the Spirit will command the euill thing, so that thou boldly and without fear yeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be againsted at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madness of lusts, haue put off all commone reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spiritue do they belch out? For we knoweledge one Christ, and his only Spirit whomme the Prophets have commended, whomme the Gospell giueth vs dooth preach, of whom we there heare no such thing. That Spirit is no patrone of manslaughter, whoredome, drunkenesse, pride, contention, contouerstillie, and guile: but the author of love, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and truth. It is not a giddie spirit, and runneth headlong without consideration through right and wrong, but is full of wisdom, & understanding, that differneth rightly betweene lust & vnlust. It hurreth not vnto dissolute and vabridel licenciousnesse, but maketh difference betweene lawful and unlawfull, and teacheth to keep ease & temperance: but why do we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Chriptians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome phantasie, which either theielles have brought forth in a dreame, or have receuied being forged of other: but they reuerence the seake the knowledge of them at the Scriptures, where these two things be taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that he might bring vs into the obedience of God, where being purged fro vnleannesse and defilings, which obedience can not stand, vnlesse lusts be tamed & subdued, whereunto these me would giue the bridle Of the manner how to receive at libetinie. Secondly we are taught that we are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are still besieged with many vices and much weaknesse: so long as we are inclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, we have neede alway to increase somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we have neede daily to wrestle with them. Whereupon also followeth, that shaking of sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedfull minde, that we be not compassed vnwarne with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peraduenture we thinke that we have proceeded further than the Apostle, which yet was weared of the Angel of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weaknesse: and which did vnsonedly represent in his flesh that division of the flesh, and of the spirit.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth seven either causes or effectes or partes thereof, he doth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeauour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, fear, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurditie, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effectes. For both may be defended in disputatiion. They may bee also called affections joyned with repentance: but because, leaung out those questiones, we may understand what Paul meaneth, we shall be content with a simple declaration of them. He faith therefore, that of the heauenlinessse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithall stirred vp to diligence and heedfulnessse, to winde himselfe cleanly out of the snares of the diuell, to take better heed of his snares, to fall no more from the government of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the judgement of God, either doth deny that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnesse of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in craving of pardon, than in defence of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confess their faultes, doe yet vse intreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they have not cast away the reuencie that they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they go not about to proove themselves righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation thereby the sinner freeth inwardly with himselfe, quarrelleth with himselfe, is angrie with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne puerilnesse and his owne unthankfulnessse to God. By the name of fear, he meaneth that trembling that is stricken into our minde: so oft as we thinke both what we have deruered, and how horrible is the feueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For wee must needs then be vexed with a mostelious vnquietnesse, which both instructeth vs to humilitie, and maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Now if out of fear do springing that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then we see with what lancing they hang together. It seemeth to me that he hath vset this worde Desire for diligence in our dutie and ready cheerefulnesse to obey, whereas to the acknowledg- ing of our owne faultes ought cheerfully to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeal, which he ioyneth immediately next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearfulnesse, wherewith we be kindled when we are spured forward with these prickinge thoughts: what have I done? whither had I throwne my selfe headlong, if the mercie of God did not helpe me? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigorous that we be to our selves, and the strictlier that we examine our owne faultes, so much the more we ought to tryst that God is favourabe and mercifull vnto vs. And truly it is not possible, but that the soule being stricken with horror of the judgement of God must needs doe some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truly the godly do feel what punishments are flame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselfes, and other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledgeing of sinnes. But let vs remember that that there is measure to be kept, that sorrow do not swallow vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to fearful confidences than falling to despair. And also by that craftie meane whomsoever Satan findeth overthrown with dread of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulfe of sorrow, that they may never rise vp againe. Truly the fear cannot be too great which endeth with humiliation, and departure not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he move himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, he despair not, oppressed with too great feare, for so do we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Upon which point this lection of Bernard is very profitable: Sorrow for sins is necessarie, if it be not continual. I counsell you sometime to returne your fault from grievous and painful remembrance of your own woes, and to climb vp to the plaine ground of cheerful remembrance of benefits of God. Let vs mingle hone with wormwood, that the wholesome bitterness may bring vs health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetnes. And if ye thinke of your fulnes in humilitie, thinke also of the Lord in goodnes.

16 Now it may be also perceived what be the fruits of repentance, cuyen the duties of godlines toward God, and of charitie toward men, and therewithall a holines and purenes in all our life. Finally, the more carnfully that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the better tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the commandements of the lawe, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vnreconcillie in the vevie fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies that do set our true repentance, of which thing I will hereafter set before the reader cites a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scorn at their follies that goe about to appease God with ceremonies, and do shew that they be mere mocketries, and partly do teach that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principal part of repentance, because God looketh upon the heart: whosoever is cuyen meanely exercised in the Scripture, shall perceive of himselfe without any mans putting in minde, that when we have to do with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inwarde affection of the heart. And the place of Joel shall not a little helpe to the understanding of the rest, where he saith: T care your heart and not your garments. Also both those points are expressed in these worde of James: Yee wicked doores, cleanse your hands: yee double men, purge your hearts. Where indeede there is an addition ionned to the first part, but after is shewed the vevie fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthines, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises, which we feele priaty as remedies to humble our fulnes or to tame our flesh, and publickely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceede from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to be in louefromnes, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgiousificte, and all trimmings, and to forfake all delights. Then hee that feeleth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridde it. Moreover he that well bethinketh him how grieuous a thing it is to have offended the justice of God, cannot rest vntill he haue in his owne humilitie given glorie unto God. Such exercises the old writers do ofentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruits of repentance. But albeit they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readeres shall pardon me, if I speake what I thinke: it seemeth vnto me that they stande too much vp on them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I trust he will agree with me, that they haue two waies gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, and with immeasurable commendation advanced that bodily discipline, this indeed they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that, which ought to have been of much greater importance. Secondly, in giving punishments they were somewhat more rigorous than ecclesiastical mildness may be, as we shall have occasion to shew in another place.

17 But because many when they hear weeping, fasting and ashes spoken of, both often in other places and specially in Joel, they measure the chief part of repentance by fasting and weeping: therefore their error is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance: but weeping and fasting are not joined as continual or necessary effects thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a special circumstance. Because he had prophesied, that there hanged over the Jews a most grievous destruction, therefore he counsell'd them to prevent the wrath of God, not only in repenting, but also in uttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arraigned, with humbly to abase himself, with an overgrown beard, uncombed hair, and black apparel, to move the judge to pity; so he behooved them when they stood accused before the judgement seat of God in pitious array to beseech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peradventure more fitly agree with those times; yet it is certain, that weeping and fasting should be to a very convenient good, and among you, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamity. For when he maketh any danger to appear, he doth after a certain maner give warning, that he is prepared or armed to revenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrymen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowful manner of accursed men, whose offences he said a little before, were had in examination. Even as the Pastors of the Church should not do ill at this day, if when they see any rune hanging over the neckes of their people, they would cry out upon them to make haste to fasting and weeping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, always enforce that which is the principal point, that they must cut their hearts and not their garments. It is of doubt, that fasting is not always joined with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ joineth it with weeping, when he acquainteth the Apostles from need thereof, until the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. 1 speak of solemn fasting. For the private life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that in the whole course thereof there may appear a certain kind of fasting. But because all this matter shall be to be declared againe in the place where we shall treat of the discipline of the Church, therefore I do now the more tenderly touch it.

18 But this one thing I will addde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is improperly turned from the natural meaning which I have above set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning unto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine and guiltines. So to do penance in ashes and sackcloth is nothing else, then to utter a displeasednes when God is angry with vs for grievous offences. And this is a publick kind of confession, whereby we condemning ourselves before the Angels and the world, do present the judgement of God. For Paul rebukeing their slothfullnesse that tenderly bear with their own faults, saith: if we did judge our selves, we should not be judged of God. But it is not always necessary to make men openly of counsell and witness of our repentance: but to confess privetly to God is a part of true repentance which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more unreasonabl than to look to have God to pardon vs the sinnes in which we flatter our selves and doe indite them by hypocrisy, lest he should bring them to light. And it behoveth vs not only to confess those sinnes which we daily commit, but more grievous offences. offences ought to draw vs further, and to call agayne into our remembrance things that seeme long agoe buried. Which lesson David giuen vs by his example. For being touched with shame of his newly committed fault, hee examineth him selfe even to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, and confesseth that even then he was corrupted and infected with the filthineffe of the flesh. And this he doth not to diminish the hamoure of his faults, as many hide themselves in the multitude, and seek to escape punishment by wrapping other with them. But David doth farre otherwise which with simple plamenes enforceth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancy, he hath not ceas'd to heape evils upon evils. Allo in another place he likewise do examineth his paffed life, that hee craueth the mercy of God for the finnes of his youth. And truely then onely shall we puoue our drountines to be shaken away from vs, if growing vnder our burden and bewailing our evils, we askerclee of God. It is moreover to be noted, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that lifteath vp as it were from death, them that either have filthily fallen, or with vnbrideled licentiousnesse have thrown forth themselves to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious rebelling, have shaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it reprehendeth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatrie and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threatneth mourning vnto sinners that have not done penance for their wantonnes, fornication vndchafttie. This difference is to be diligentie marked, leaft while we heare that few are called to penance, more than careless co大夫...

"The grace of Christ."

Lib. 3. 162.

Psal. 51. 7.

Psal. 51. 9.

2 Cor. 12. 21.

2. Col. 2. 19. Now if that be true, which is most evidentely certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall points, Repentance and forgiveness of sinnes: doe wee not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely instruct them that be his, that he may also by the factification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousnesse? John the Angell spake before the face of Christ to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kindeome of heaven is come nere at hand. In calling them to Repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselves sinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lord, that they might with all their harts desire the mortifying of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdom of God, he called them to Faith for by the kingdom of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgiveness of sinnes, salvation, and life, and all that ever we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Evangelistes it is written, John came preaching the Baptisme of Repentance vnto forgiveness of sinnes. And what is that else, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lord, and concerne good hope of forgiveness and salvation? So Christ also began his preaching: The kingdom of God is come nere at hand: repent ye and believe the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then he requeareth repentance, and leaft of all confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when he meant briefly to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he said that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that Repentance and forgiveness of sinnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised raised up by God, to give to Israel repentance and forgiveness of sins. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe hear by the doctrine of the Gospel, that all their thoughts, their affections, and their rudiments are corrupt and faultie, and that therefore it is necessary that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdom of God. Forgiuens of sins is preached when men are taught that Christ is made to them redemption, righteousness, salvation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are receiued by Faith, as I have in another place declared: yet because the goodness of God whereby sins are forgiven is the proper obiect of Faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from Repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of Repentance, openeth vs the first entry into Christ, which he woth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, laboe, are loden, are hungry and thirstie, and pine away with sorrow and misery: so must we endeavour towards Repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to Repentance: he was sent to blest the vnworthy, but so that every one should turne himselfe from his wickednes. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiuensesse of sinnes, he likewise vext to require on our part Repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercie ought to be to men a caufe to repent them, Doe (faith he) judgment and righteousness, because salvation is come neere at hand. Againe, there shall come to Sion a Redeemer, and to them that in Jacob repent from their sinnes. Againe, Seeketh the Lord while he may be found: call upon him while he is neere. Let the wicked leaue his way and the wickednes of his thoughts, and be turned to the Lord, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe, Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our Repentance were a foundation to deserve pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to have mercy upon men to this end that they should repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauell if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwel in the prison of our body, we must continually waffle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our owne natural soule. Plato faith in certaine places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall study and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it be ytterly shaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in vs. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire and go no further, but rather that he should haft and long toward God, that been graffed into the death and life of Christ, hee should study vpon a continuall repentance: as truely they cannot otherwise doe, that haue a natural hatred of sinne: for no man ever hated sinne, unless he were first in loue with righteousness. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well known by the doctrine aboue taught, that I neede not to repeat a long discourse to prove it againe. Therefore the Church prayeth and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that he hath given the Gentiles Repentance vnto saluation. And Paul commanding Timotheu to be patient and mild toward the unbelieuers, faith: If at any time GOD giue them Repentance that they may repent from the inanes of the deceit: God indeed affirmeth that he willith the conversion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectual working thereof hangeth vpon the Spirit of regeneration. Becauze it were more caine to create vs men, then of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we

we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Whomsoever the Lords will is to deliver from death, those he quickeneth with the spirit of regeneration: not that repentence is properly the cause of saluation, but because it is already seen that it is unseparable from Faith and from the mercie of God: (as E£ay testifieth) that there is a Redeemer come to him, and to those that in Jacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truly standeth steadfastly determined, that wherefoever lieth the feare of God, there the Spirit hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore in ££ay, when the Faithfull comaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their harts were hardened by God. The Apostle also meaning to exclude Apostates from hope of saluation, appointeth this reason, that it is impossible for them to be renewed vnto Repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perishe, fheweth a token of his fatherly favoure, and in a maner draweth them vnto him with the beames of his cheerefull and merie countenaunce: on the other side, with hardening them, he thundereth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is vnpardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threateneth to wilful Apoftates, which when they depart from the Faith of the Gospell, doe make a scorn of God, reprochfully despite his grace, and defile and tread vnder feece the blooke of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doth not (as some fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut off hope of pardon from all wilful sinnes: but teacheth that Apostle is unworthy of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that God doth punish a contempt of himselfe so full of facrilege, with vnpappeasable rigor. For he faith that it is impossible, that they which haue once beene enlightened, haue tasted of the heavenly gift, haue beene made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they fall, should be renewed to Repentance, crucifying againe of new, and making a scorn of the Sonne of God. Againe in another place: If (faith he) we willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth received, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of judgement, &c. These also be the places, out of the wrong understanding whereof, the Newtestaments in olde time haue gathered matter to play the madmen: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleued this to be a counterfaite Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes doth truly fauour of an Apostatike Spirit. But because we contend with none but with them that allow it, it is easie to shew, how these sentences doe nothing maintain their errour. First it is necessarie that the Apostle agree with his Master, which affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemie shall be forgien, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgien neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnslee he will make him an aduerarie to the grace of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weakenesse, and openly the weth that a man is polluted of a deuill.

22 But to discourse this, it behooveth to enquire what is that same so horrible of fense, that shall haue no forgivingnesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffenes even vnto death, with defpaire of pardon, that doth not well agree with the very words of Christ, that it shall not be forgien in this world. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life, But if Augustine's definition bee true, then it is not committed, vnslee it continue even vnto death. Wheras some other say that he sinneth against the holy Ghost, that ensueth the grace bestowed upon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once prooued with sure testimonies, shall easely by it selfe outrethall the rest. I say therefore, that by theinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose refult the truth of God, with brightnede whereof they are so dazed, that they cannot pretend ignorance : which they do onely to this end to refult. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had said, immediately addeth: Hee that speaketh a worde against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiuen him: but he that blaspemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgiuen. And Matthew for the blaspemie against the holy spirit, putteth the spiritie of blaspemie. But howe can a man speake a reproch against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that tumbe vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which do ignorantly speake euill of Christ, having yet this minde, that they would not extinguih the truth of God discolred vnto them, or once with one worde offende him, whom they had known to be the Lords annointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hate fully detete the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospell, they would be readie to worship with all their hart. But they whose conscience is convinced, that it is the worde of God which they forfake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are faile to blaspem the holie Ghost: forasmuch as they wrasle against the enlightning that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Isewes, which when they could not refult the Spiritethat spake by the Stephend, yet endeavoured to refult. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zeal of the law, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage against God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lorde inueth, which to overthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Belzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blaspemie, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapteth forth to reproch the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorantly committed those things through vnbeleepe, for which otherwise he had beene vnwoorthy of Gods favour. If ignorance royned with vnbeleepe was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is royned to vnbeleepe.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shalt perceive that the Apostle speakeith not of one or other particular fall, but of the vniuerse fall departing whereby the reprobate do forfake saluation. And it is no manuall, that they whom John in his canonical epifile affirneth not to have bee of the elect, from whom they went out, doe feele God vnappreasible. For he directeth his speech against them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling them from this false and pestilent opinion, he faith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that willingely and willingly have cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgreift the word of the Lorde, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the decrees is in these words of falling and finning. Because the Noutians expounde Falling to be, if a man, being taught by the lawe of the Lord, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, abstaineth not from steale or fornication. But contrariwise I affirme, that there is a secret companion of contraries, wherein ought to be repeated all things contrarie to that which was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular fault, but the whole turning away from God, and as I may so call it, the Apostatis of the whole man. Therefore when hee faith, they which have fallen after that they have once beeene enlightened, and have taffed the heavenly gift, and beeene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also taffed the good word of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be understood of them, that with aduised vngodlines have choked choke the light of the holy Spirit, have spit out againe the taste of the heavenly gift, have estranged them selves from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, have troden under foote the word of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to express that adulterous purpose of wickednesse, in another place afterward he addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he faith, that there is left no sacrifice for them, that sin willingly after knowledge of the truth receiued, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continual sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crueth out almost in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the priesthood of Christ) but he faith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospel is of set purpose renounced.

24 But whereas some doe think it too harde and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lords mercy, that is easily answered. For he doth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lord: but he utterlie denieth, that they can rise unto Repentance, because they are by the just judgement of God stricken wit eternal blindness for their unthankfulnesse. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that afterward he applyeth to this purpose the example of Efua, which in vaine attempted with howling and weeping to recover his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophet, when they erie, I will not heare. For in such Pufactes of speech is meant neither the true conversion, nor calling vpon God, but that carefulnesse of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremitie to looke unto that which before they carelesly neglected, that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they do not so much call vpon, as they mourn that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation freteth and vexeth the wicked. Thys it is good to make diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so soon as the finner turneth. And as I haue already faide, it is certain that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preventing it. Also his promise concerning calling vpon him, will never deceale. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuellishly dravene, when they see that they must needs seeke God, that they may finde remedy for their euils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Convocation and Prayer.

25 But a question is moued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained Repentance, how Ahab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whom yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to have beene onely stricken amased with sodaine fear. He did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the ground, and (as it is testified of him) he was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garments when his hart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet we see howe God is turned to mercie. I answere that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that ever the wrath of God lyeth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their fakes, as for common example. For whereas Ahab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got he thereby, but that he should not feel it aliue in earth? Therefore the curious of God although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternal destruction. This same is to be seen in Efan. For though he had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was granted him at his weeping. But because the spiritual inheritance, by the Oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercy of God: this comfort was left him as to a beaftly man, that he should be satie with the fatte of the earth and the deawe of Heauen. And this is it that I said euene now, that it ought to be referred to the

the example of the other, that we should learne the more chearfully to apply our mindes and endeavours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truely and hartily turned, God will be ready to forgue us, whose mercifulnes extendeth itselfe even to the vnworthy, so long as they shew any griefe at all. And therewith all we be also taught, how terrible judgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sport with no lesse shameles face than yron heart to despise and set nought by the threatenings of God. After this manner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Israel, to relieve their miseries, although their crimes were counterfeit, and their hearts double and false, as himselfe in the Pialme complai-neth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly genteel dealing to bring them to earnest conversion, or to make them vnexcusab.
Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetual law thereby, but rather fifteth sometime more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their pains, that thereby may appeare how much faining diplingast him. But (as I have faide) he sheweth some examples of his readiness to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, and their pride may be the more gricously condemned, that stubbornly kick against the pricks.

The iiiij. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their Schooles of Penance, is far from the purityes of the Gofsell.Where is entretuned of Confession and satisfaction.

Now I come to discourse those things, which the Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will runne over in as few wordes as may bee, because I minde not to go through all, leaft this booke, which I labour to draw into a short abridgement, should grow to a huge greate kitchen. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, being a matter otherwise not verie hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining it, they shew that they never understood what repentance was. For they take holde of certaine layings of the old writers, which do nothing at all express the nature of repentance, as that to repent is to wepe for sinnes past, and not to commit sinnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils past, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorrie to haue committed. Againe: that it is a forrowe of heart, and bitterness of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to graunt these things well faide of the fathers (which a contentious man might easilie enough denie) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe repentance, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had beene dra-Wen. But if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adioyned as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysostome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinnes, a gift giuen from heaven, a manuellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the law. Yea and the doctrine which they afterward teach, is somewhat woordes then these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises, that a man can gather nothing else out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigoroussell that strencheth partly to take the fleth, and partly to chastise and punish vices: but they keepe manuellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is indeede much talke among them of Contrition and Attraction: they torment soules with many doubts, & do thrust into them much trouble & carefullnes: but when they seem to have throughly wounded the harts, they heal the bitterness with a light sprinkling of ceremonies. And when they have thus curiously defined repentance, they divide it into contrition of hart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of workes, no more logically then they defined it, although they would seeme to have wasted all their age in framing of syllologisms. But if a man will goe about to proove by the definition (which kind of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may wepe for his sins passed, and commit no more to be wepe for, that he may bewail his sins passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may punish himself for that which he was sorrie to have committed, &c. although he doe not confess with his mouth: howe will they maintaine their division? For if that true penitent man doe not confess, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this division is referred to repentance, in respect that it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame me, but let them laye the fault in themselves that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my gresse) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their masterlike licence. Now let vs particularly consider all the parts in order. Where as I do negligently leape over as triles those things that with great gratitie of couerce do publish for mysteries, I doe it not unlawfully, (neither were it verie painefull for mee) to confute all that they thinke themselves to haue deeply and suttly disputed) but I woulde thinke it against conscience to wearie the Readers with such trifles without any profit. Truely it is easie to knowe by the questions why they moove and toffe, and wherewith they miserablie encomber themselves, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sin pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in other. Again: whether the punishments laid upon man by God, do annaile to satisfaction. Again: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterated for deadly sins: where they fouldly and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for venial sins. Likewise they very much torment themselves with a grosse error, upon the sayeing of Hierome, that repentance is a second bourse after shipwracke. Wherin they shew that they never waked from their brutish dulness, to feelie so much as a farre off the thousandth part of their faults.

2. But I would the Readers should note, that here is not a quarrell about the shadow of an aile, but the most earnest matter of all others is intreated of, that is to say, forgiveness of sinnes. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of hart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of workes: they doe therewith all teach that those three things are necessarie to the obtaining of forgiveness of sinnes. But if it behooveth vs to know any thing at all in all our religion, this truly belongeth vs most of all, I meane to understand and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, upon what condition, with what easenfull or hardnesse the forgiveness of sinnes is obtained. If this knowledge stande not plaine and certain, the conscience shall have no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednes, but continually trembleth, waucreth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horrible dreadeth, hateh and fleeth the light of God. But if the forgiveness of sinnes hang upon those conditions to which they doe binde it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Contrition the fift part of obtaining pardon, and they require that to bee a true Contrition, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meanesse time they doe not determine when a man may bee assured, that he hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contrition. True it is that euery man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his sinnes, to what himselfe more and more to a loathing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrow not to bee repent, that breede repentance.

We should never attain to any qualities of minde if that which the Schoolemen have taught concerning contrition were true.

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receiue unto faluation. But when there is such a bitternes of forrow required as may proportionally answer the greatnes of the faults, and such as may in balance counterpoiswith the weight of pardon, here the poor conffences are maruellously tormented and troubled: when they fee themselves charged with a due contrition of sins, and do not to attain the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselves, that they have duly performed so much as they duly ought. If they fay that we must do as much as lyeth in us, then come we still to the fame point that we are at before: for how dare any man affure himfelfe that he hath employed all his force to bewail his fins? So when the conffences having long wrappled with themselves, and long beene exercised with battles, do at length finde no halen to reft in, yet somewhat to safe themselves, they enforce themselves to a forrow, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

But if they fay that I flannder them: Let them come forth and fhow any one man, that by fuch doctrine of contrition hath not either beene driven to difpaire, or hath not fet for his defence a counterfaffing of forrow infeede of true forrow, again-the judgement of God. We have also our felves faid in one place, that forouenes of fannes never commeth without repentance, because none but the afflifted and wounded with confience of fannes, can fincerely call upon the meric of God: but we have therewith all further faid, that repentance is not the caufe of the forouenes of fannes. As for thofe torments of foules, which they fay must be performed of duty, we have taken them away: we have taught the finner not to looke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to fiften both his eyes vpon the onely meric of God. We have onely put him in minde that Christ called the labouring and laden, when he was fent to publifh glad tydings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preache remiffion to captuves, to deluer prisoners, and to comfort them that moune. From which I fhould be excluded both the Pharifees, that filled with their owne righteoufnefs, do not acknowledge their owne pooretie, and alfo the defpifers that careles of Gods wrath do fexe no remedie for their cauls. For fuch do not labour, nor are laden, nor contrite in hart, nor bond, nor captuue. But there is great difference betwenee teaching a man to deferue forouenes of fannes with due and full contrition, which the finner can neuer performe: and informing him to hunger and thift for the meric of God, that by the acknowledging of his owne infenie, by his owne vniuenes, warines and caprichie, it may be fhewed him, where he ought to seeke for reliefe, repit and libertie: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himfelfe, to glifie glory to God.

Concerning confefion, there hath beene alwaies great strife betwenee the Canoniftes and the Schoole diuines: while the one forte affume, that confefion is commanded by the speciall commandement of God, and the other forte deny it and fay, that it is commanded onely by the Ecclefiasticall confufitions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable fhameleffice of the diuines, that have cor-rupped and violently wretfted as many places of Scripture, as they alleaged for their purpose. And when they fay that they could not fo obtain that which they required, they which would be thought more little than the refcape away with this shift, that confefion came from the lawe of God, in refpect of the substance of it, but afterward received forme of the lawe Poftitute. Even as the fooliffheft fort among the lawyers do fay, that Citations came from the lawe of God, because it is fake: Adam where art thou? And likewife Exceptions, because Adam anfwered as it were by way of exception faying: The wife that thou gaveft me, &c. But that both citations & exceptions received from given them by the Civil law. But let vs fee by what arguments they prooue this confefion, either Formed or Unformed to be the com-mandements of God. The Lord (fay they) fent the leprous men to the Prieftes. But what? Sent he them to confefion? Who euer heard it fpoken, that the Leuiticall priestes
priestes were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, Deut. 17. 8. And say: It was commanded by the Lawe of Moses, that the priestes should difference betweene leprose and leproie: sinne is a spiritual leprose: therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce upon it. Before that I anfwered them, I ask this by the way. If this place make them Judges of the spiritual leprose? why do they draw to them the knowledge of natural and fitly leprose? This foroouthe is not to mooke with the Scriptures. The lawe giuent to the Levitick Priestes the knowledge of the Leprofe, therefore let vs take it upon vs. Sinne is a spiritual leprose, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Now I anfwered fith the priesthood was removed, it is necessarie that the Lawe be removed also. All priesthoodes are removed to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him only all the right and honour of priesthood is also removed. If they loue fo well to follow allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely priest, and heape upon his judgement the free jurisdiction of all things: this we can easily be contented to suffer. Moreover their allegorie is verie vnfit, that feteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is merelie policke. Why then did Christ send the leprose men to the Priestes? That the Priestes should not caull that he did brake the lawe that commanded that he be healed of the leprose, to be sheded before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commanded the leprose men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the lawe, Goet faith he and shewe your felowes to the Priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commanded in the Lawe that it should be for a witness unto them. And truely this miracle should have beene a witness vn- to them, for they had pronounced them leprose, and now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christs miracles? Christ leaueth to the his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they fiell daily with it, therefore this worke is for a witness unto the. So in another place: This Gofpel shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. Againe: Ye shall be led before kings and governors, for a witness to them, that is: that in the judgmend of God they may be more strongly confuted. But if they had rather follow Chryfofiome: he alfo teacheth that Christ did this for the Jews take, that he should not be accounted a breaker of the Law. Albeit in fo clear a matter I am ashamed to allenge the witness of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leaueth the right of the Priestes to the professed enemie of the Gofpell, which were alway bent to cast against it, if their mouth had not beene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priestes may still keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessities be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

8. They bring their second argument out of the fame fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not prove that I can make a furer shew of them for my fide, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lord commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raifed vp, they should vnbind and looie him from his bonds. Here be thef they lie: for it is no where read that the Lordes fide this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he fide to the Jews that fode by him, that the miracle might be made the more evident without fufpicion of fraud, and his power appeare the greater; that without any touching, with his onely word he raifed vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion from the Jews, willed the to roll away the stone, to feele the ftnike, to behold allured tokens of death, to fee him rizing by the only power of his word, and then fift to feele him living. And this is the judgment of Chryfofiome. But let vs grant that this was fpoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lord gave his Apoifles power to...

to loose. But how much more fitly and more handielly might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lord meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose t hem that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those finnes that he had forgotten: that they should not condemne them for finnes whom he had acquited: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiv'n: that they should not be rigorous to punish, and lightly offended, where he is mercifull and easily entreated to spare? Truely, nothing ought to move vs more to readiness and forgivnesse, than the example of the Judge that threatned that he will be vnappeasable to them that be too rigorous and vngentle. Now let them go and boast of their allegories.

6 But now they joine more neere hand with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to John's baptisme, did confesse their finnes, and James willeth that we confesse our finnes one to another. No marueile if they that would be baptised did confesse their finnes, for it was said before that John preached the baptisme of repentance, and baptised in water into repentance. Whom should he then have baptiz'd, but them that had confesst themselves finnes? Baptisme is a token of the forguinesse of finnes: and who should be admitted to this token but finners, and they that acknowledge them selues to be such? Therefore they confesst their finnes, that they might be baptiz'd. And not without a caufe doth James bid vs confesse one to another. But if they did make what followeth next after, they would vnderstand, that this also maketh little for them. Confesse (faith he) one to another your finnes, and pray one for another. He joyneth together mutuall confesse and mutuall prayer. If we must confesse to priefts only, then must we also pray for priefts only. Yea, What and if it might follow of the words of James that onely priefts might confesse? for when he willeth that we should confesse one to another, he speaketh onely to them that may heare the confessions of other: his word is in Grecce Alelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turnes, or (if they so like belte to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so interchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meete to heare confessions. Which prerogative ish they vouchsafe to graunt only to priefts, we do also put over the office of confessting to them only. Therefore away with such triflings, and let vs take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple and plain: that is, that we should lay our weaknesse one in anotheres boosome to receive mutuall counsell, mutuall compassion, and mutuall eftort one of another: then that we being naturally privy to the weaknes of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then alledge James against vs: which do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can confesse Gods mercy, vnlesse he haue first confesse his owne misterie. Yea we rather pronounce him accurs'd that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himself a sinner. For the Lord hath concluded all vnder finnes, that all mouthes might be stoped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he onely justified and exalted.

7 But I marueile with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the lawe of God: the vse whereof we graunt in deed to be verie auncient, but such as we are able to prove in old time to haue bene a libertie. Truely eu'n their owne chronicles declare, that there was no certaine Lawe or constitution of it before the tyme of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient lawe, they would rather haue taken hold thereof, than haue bin contented with the decree of the counsell of Lateran, and so made themselues to be laughe at, eu'n of children. In other things they flicke not to make forgeft decrees, which they father upon the most auncient Counsellors, that they may with very reuerence of antiquitie dazle the eyes of the fimple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a falfe pack. Therefore by their owne witnesse, there are not yet pass'd three hundred

hundred yeeres since Innocent the third laide that share uppon men, and charged them with necessitie of Confession. But, to speake nothing of the time, the very barbarousnes of the wordes minimeth the credite of that lawe. For where these good fathers command every one of both kindes, male and female, once every yeare to confess all his sins to his own priest, pleasantr men do merily take exception, that in this commandement are contained onely Hermaphrodites, and saye that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onely. Since that time, a more grossse beast-lineffe hath bewrayed itselfe in their schollers, that cannot expound what is meant by his owne priest. Whatsoever all the Popes hyred bablers do prate, we hold both that Christ was the author of this lawe, that compellid all men to reckon vp their sins, and also that there passed a thousand and two hundred yeeres from the resurrection of Christ before that any such lawe was made. And so, that this tyranny was then first brought in, when all godlineffe and learning beeing destroyed, the visors of Papists had without choice taken all licentiousnes uppon them. Moreover thare are euent testimonies both in histories and other ancient writers, which teache that this confession was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a law made by Christ or his apostles. I will allege but one out of many, which shall be a plain proofe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitution of bishops was diligently kept in all the West Churches, but specially at Rome. Wherby he theweth that it was no vniversal ordinance of all churches. But he faith that there was one of the priests peculiarly appointed to itne for this office. Wherby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men doe falsely say of the keys given for this vniversal to the whole order of priesthood. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall dutie of some one that was chosen thereunto by the Bisho. The famie is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall churches they call Penitentiaria, the examiner of-honour of sins, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he faith immediately after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman faining that she came to confession, was found to have coloured vnder that pretence the vnhonest company that she vfed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these affees lift vp their cares. If auricular confessio were the law of God, how durst Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schismaticke Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the contending voices of all the old fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not only let slip for a time, but also discontinued even till within time of his remembrance. Yet let them condemne of apostatie not only the Church of Constantinople, but also all the East Churches which have neglected that lawe, which (if they lay true) is insuable and commanded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation chrysestone, which was also bishop of Constantinople, was in so many places audacely refus'd, that it is manerfull that these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (faith he) thy sins that thou hast done away, if thou be ashamed to tell any man the sins that thou hast done, tell them daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sins upon thy bed, that thy conscience may daily recog-nize thee evil. Again: but new it is not necessarie to confess when witnesss be present: let the examination of thy sinnes be done with thy thought: let this judgment bee without witness: let only God see thee confessing. Again: I do not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow seruants, I do not compell thee to declerate thy sinnes to men, receaue and vter thy confessions before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the best surgon, and ask of him. Shew to him that will reprocus thee with...

with nothing, but will most gently heal thee. Again: Tell not man, lest he reprocue thee, for neithier is it to be confessed to thy fellow servant, that may vter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy wounds which hast care of thee, that is both gentle and a Philistian. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call manie witnesses, tell thy sinne to me alone privately, that I may heal thine pore. Shall we say that Chrysostome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliuer mens confessions from these bondes where with they be bound by the law of God? not so. But he dare not require that as of necessity, which he doth not understand to be commanded by the word of God.

But that the matter may be made the plainer and easier, first we will faithfully reheare, what kind of confession is taught by the word of God: and then we will also declare their intentions, but not all (for who could draw one such an infinite eas?) but only those wherein they comprehend the summe of their secret confession. Here I am loth to reheare how oft the old translator hath guien in translation this worde Confess in freeede of Praise: which the grossest vnlearned men commoune know: saying that it is good to have their presumptuousness bewrayed, that do giue away that which was written of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannicall commandement. To proue that confession auadeth to cheare the mindes they thruit in that place of the Psalm: In the voice of rejoicing and confession. But if such change may serue, then we shall haue what we lift, proued by what we lift. But seeing they are so become past shame, let the godly reader remember that by the iust vengeance of God they have bene cast into a reprobate minde, that their presumption should be the more detestable. But if we lift in the simple doctrine of the scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceit to begulle vs. For there is appointed one order of confessing, that as much as it is the Lorde that forgiveth, forgiveth, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confess our sins to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Philistian, therefore let vs shewe our diseases vsnto him. It is he that is grieved and offended, therefore let vs seek peace at his hand. He is the knower of harts, and pruient to all thoughts, therefore let vs make haste to powre out our harts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him.

I haue (faith Davi'd) made my finne knowne vnto thee, and haue not hidden my vnrighteousnesse. I haue said, I will confess against me my vnrighteousnesse to the Lord, and thou hast forgiven the wickedness of my hart. Such is the other confession of Davi'd. Haue mercy vpon me O God, according to thy great mercy. And such is the confession of Daniel: We haue sinned, Lord we have done peruerfly, we haue committted iniquities, and haue beene rebellious in swaruing from thy commandements. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in Scripture, the hearthfall whereof would almoast fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnes (faith John) the Lord is faithfull to forgive vs our sinnes. To whom should we confess? even to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled and humbled hart before him, if hartilly acusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquited by his goodnes and mercy.

H ee that hartily and before God shall embrace this confession, shall undoubtedly haue both a tooong readie to confess, so oft as it shall be needfull for him to publish the merie of God before men, and not onely to whisper the secret of his hart to one man, and once and in his care: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world simply to reheare both his owne shame and the magnificence & glory of God. After this manner when Davi'd was rebuked of Nathan, hee was pricked with the sting of conscience, and confessed his sinne before both God and man. I haue (faith he) sinned to the Lord, that is to say, now I alledge nothing for my excuse, I vse no fliestes, but that all men may judge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would have had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glory of God or for the humbling of our souls. For this reason the Lorde in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speak the words, and the people saying after him should openly confess their iniquitie in the Church. For he foreknew that this help was necessary for them, that every man might be the better brought to a just reknowledging of himselfe. And meete it is, that with the confession of our owne inueterie we should among our selues, and before all the world glorifie the goodnes and mercie of our God.

11 And it is convenient that this kind of confession be both ordinary in the Church, and also extra ordinarily said in special maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guiltie of anie generall fault. Of this second kind we haue an example in that solemn confession which all the people vysed by the means and guiding of Esdras and of Nehemeus. For whereas that long baneith, the destruction of the City and Temple, the diffoluing of religion, was the punishiment of the common reuolting of them all: they could not acknowledge the benefit of dehance in such a sort as was meete, unless they did first condemnemselues. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometyme be innocent. For such as be the members of a feele and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfullnesse. Yet it is not possible but they must also themselves gather some infection and beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrennesse or any other plague: if it be our dutie to flie to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltines: then confession itselfe, whereupon all these things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confession, beside that it is commanded by the Lords owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For whereas in all holy assemblies we make our appearance in the light of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of unworthinesse? But that (some man will saie) is done by euerie prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confess our sinnes. I grant. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or doutinesse, or sloughishnesse, you will grant me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemn vs of confession, the Christian common people should be exercized to humbling themselfes. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Izaclutes, was parcell of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belonged to vs. And truly we see that this vs is in well ordered Churches profitably obtained, that euery Sunday the minister should rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe and of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this keie the gate to prayer is opened as well privately to euerie man, as visuellerly to all men.

12 Moreoever the Scripture alloweth two formes of private confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that sayeing of James is spoken, that we shoule confesse our sinnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesse one to another, we should one help another, with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme that is to be vied for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if he have in any thing beene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although James in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bolesome we should vnloose our selues, leaue vs a free choise to confesse to him that shall seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the Church; yet we ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be judged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparision of the rest, because the Lord appoineth them by the vertue calling of their ministrie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdues & correct our sinnes, and also may receive comfort.

Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive comfort by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutual admonishment and reproving is committed to all men, yet it is specially enjoyned to the ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort and confirm one another in confidence of God's mercy: yet we see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the sureness of sinners, are ordained as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be made to forgive sinners and loose souls. When thou hearest this to be ascribed unto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let every one of the faithful remember this to be his duty, if he be privately so vexed and troubled with the feeling of sinners that he cannot winde out himself without help of another, not to neglect the remedy that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to vise the private confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to crave the private help of him, whose duty it is both publiquely and privately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospel. But where this moderation is to be vised, where God appointed no certainty, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those only, that shall understand themselves to have neede of it. Then that even they that vise it for their neede, should not be compelled by anie commandement, or trained by anie deceipt, to reckon up all their sinnes, but so farre as they thinke it behoefeful for them, that they may receive found fruit of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leace this libertie to the churches, but also to maintain it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will haue tyrannie absent from their ministerie and superstition from the people.

13 Of the other sort of confession Christ spakest in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembrest that thy brother hath anie thing against thee, leave thy gift there, and go, and first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity that hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and craving pardon of the offence that we have committed. Under this kind is contained their confession that haue sinned even to the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the private offence of one man, to forbid from holie mysteries all them that haue sinned against their brother, till they be with just amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any vili example, should recover the favour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian received againe to the communion, when he had yeelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vised in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (faith he) in due time, and then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the Bishop and the Cleargy, they receive leace to come to the communion. Any other order of forme of confessing, the Scripture vetryly knoweth not, and it is not our duty to bind consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. But the meanest time I do so much not speake against it that the sheepe shoulde present themselves to their shepheard, when they doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the quietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloseth his weaknesses vnto him. But there are dierse waies of taking away of offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is provided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be taken away, and and mens minde knit together with a bond of peace. But this we that I have spoken of is not to be despised, that we may the more willingly confesse our sinnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the judgement seat of God, confesseth it selfe guilty, and hath one only refuge vnto the mercie of God: it is no slender or light comfort to have there present Christ's embassador, having commandement of reconciliation, of whom it may haue abolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitablenes of the keies is worthily commended, when this embalisme is performed rightly, and with such order and religiousnes as beforemeth it. Likewise when he that had in a maner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiued pardon, and is restored into brotherly vnitie: how great a benefit is it that hee vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgien by them, to whom Christ hath said: To whom soever ye forgie sinnes in earth, they shall be forgien in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnes and profit is private abolution, when it is asked by them that have need of speciall remedy to relieue their weaknesses. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promisses that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithfull, remainth nevertheless in some doubt, and hath still an vnquiet minde, as though he had not yet obtained pardoe: and the same man if he haue disclosed to his person the secret fore of his minde, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe, that saying of the Gospel, Thy sinnes are forgien thee, be of good hope, establisheth his minde vnto assurednes and is delivered from that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keies, wee must take heed that we dreame not of a certaine power seuered from the preaching of the Gospel. In another place we shall haue occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shall entreat of the government of the church: and there shall we see that all the power to binde and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his Church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mysterie of the keies, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospel be publicly and prouudely sealed vp in the hearts of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which cannot be done but by onely preaching.

15 But what say the Romish divines? They decree that euery one of either kinde, is soone as they come to the yeeres of discretion, must yeerely once at the least confesse all their sinnes to their owne priest: and that their sins is not forgien, vnlesse they have firmely conceived an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offered an intent that they may do it, there is now no more entrie open for them into Paradise. And that the priest hath the power of the keies, wherewith he may bende & bind a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vaine. Whatsoever ye bind, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselves. Some say, that there is but one keie in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is indeed requisite for a good vs, but that it is only as an assistaunce & is not essentially joined with the other. Some other, because they sewe this to be too much an unbridled licence, have reckoned vp two keies, discretion & power. Other againe, when they saw the lead boldnes of priests to be restraine by this moderation, have forgien other keies, that is to say, authority, of discerning which they should vs in giuing determinate sentence: and power, which they should practis in executing of their sentence: and that knowledge standeth by as a counsellor, But they dare not simply expound this binding & looking to be forurgie & put away sinnes: because they heare the Lord crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy sinnes, O Israel. But they say it is the priests office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare whose sinnes are forgien or retained: and that the doth declare it, either by confession when he absolvethe and retaine sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicateth and receiueth againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they vnderstand that they bee not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be obieict against them, that oftentimes their
Cap. 4. Of the maner how to receiue

Priestes do binde and loose men vnworthie, which are not therefore bound or loosed in heauen: then (which is their last refuge) they anfwer that the gaining of the keyes must be confirmd with a limitation, that is to faie, that Chrift hath promis'd, that before his judgement faie fentence of the Priests shall be allowed as hath been juftly pronounced, according as the deftruyng of him that is bound or loosed, did require. Moreover, they faie, that these keyes are given by Chrift to al priests, and are delivered to them by their Bishops, at the time of their promoting to priefthood: but the free five of them remaineth onely with such as do exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended Priests have indeed the keyes, but rustie and bound vp. And they that faie these things may well feeme modest and sober in comparifon of the reft, which upon a newe anuell haue forged newe keyes with which they faie the treasure of the Church is locked vp. These keyes we shall heereafter try in place hit for it.

16 Now I will in fewe wordes anfwer to every one of these particularly. But at this prefent I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, forasmuch as we will confider that when place conruth. But where they charge men with a law of reckoning vp all their finnes: where they faie that finne is not forgiven but vpon condition, if there bee an intent conceiued to confede it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrance into Paradife, if occaion of confeding be neglected: this is in no wised to be suffered. Must all finnes be reckoned vp? But David, (who as I thinke) had well studied vp the confeffion of his finnes, yet cried out: who shall vnderfand his errors? Lord cleane me from my secret finnes. And in another place. My iniquities haue passed aboue my head, and like a weightie burden haue waxed heauie aboue my strength. Truely he vnderstoode how great was the bottomlesse depth of our finnes: how many were the forts of our mifchiefous doings, how many heads this monfter Hydra did beare, and how long a tafe she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckone vp a regifter of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cried vnto the Lord: I am overcome, I am buried and choaked, the gates of hell haue compassed me, let thy hand draw me out, which I am drown'd in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may thinke upon the numbring of his finnes, when he feeth that David can make no number of his?

17 With this butcherie, the soules that haue been touched with any feeling of God, haue beene more cruelly vexed. First they called themselves to account: then they dividde finnes into aimes, into bowes, into braunches, and into twigges, according to these mens rules: then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumftances. And so the matter went a little forward. But when they had proceeded a little further, than was on each side skie, and on each sea, no hauen, no safe roade: the more that they had passed ouer, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their fight, yea they rofe vp as high mountains, and there appeared no hope, not so much as after long compassings, any way to escape. And so they did fixke faft betweene the sacrifice and the ftone, and at last was found no other issue but deperation. Then these cruel butcheres, so eate the wounds that themselves had made, laid certaine gentle plasters, that every man should do as much as he could. But newe cares againe rofe vp, yea newe tormentes did flye the silly soules, as to thinke: I haue not employed time enough, I haue not endeauored my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I haue pass'd ouer many things by negligence, and the forgetfulness that commeth by negligence is not executable. Then were there miniftred other plasters to affwage such paines, as Repent thee of thy negligence: if it be not altogether careless, it shall be pardoned. But all these things cannot close vp the wound, and are not so much easement of the euil, as sayl proued with honie, that they should not with their bitterness offend the fault taste but enter into the bowels before that they be perceived. Therefore this this terrible saying alway calleth vpon them and foundeth in their eares: Confeffe all thy fiennes. And this horrour can not be appeased but by assur'd comfort. Here let the readers confider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what fiennes they haue done every day: for al such experience prooueth to every man, that when at euening he shall reckon vp the faults but of one daie, his memory is confounded therewith, so great a multitude and diuerfitie presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse and blockish hypocrites that thinke they haue done sufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greatest fiennes; but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which wher they fee themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, doe addde also this faying of John: If our owne hart doe accuse vs, God is greater than our hart: and so they quake for feare at the sight of that Judge, whose knowledge far liourneth our vnderstanding.

But whereas a great part of the world refled them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poiyon was tempered, this came not fo to passe, because they beleaued that God was satisfied, or because they themselues were fully satisfied: but that the anchor cast as it were in the mid sea, should rest a little from failing, or as a way-faring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For every man may bee witnesse to himselfe, I will in a short summe shew, what manner of Law this was. First simplest it is impossible, and therefore it can doe nothing but def扬州, damne, confound, and cast in ruine and desperation. And then when it hath led sinners from the true feeling of their fiennes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselues. For while they are wholly busied in reckoning vp of their fiennes, in the mean time they forget the secret fiinne of vices, their hidden IniquitieS, and inward fleenes by knowledge whereof they should chiefly haue weighed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of conception, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomleffe depth of our euill, to be so great as paffeth our vnderstanding. After this rule we fee that the Publicanes conception was made, Lord be mercifull to me a sinner: as if he should say: All that ever I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I cannot attaine with wit or expresse toonng the greatnesse of my fiennes: let the bottomleffe depth of thy mercy swallow vp the bottomleffe depth of my fiinne. But then thou wilt say, what? are not all our fiennes to be confessed? is no conception acceptable to God, but that which is knitte vp in thefe two words, I am a sinner? No, but rather we must endeouer our selues as much as in vs lieth, to poure out our hart before the Lord, and not onely in oneword confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and hartily acknowledge our selues to be such: and with all our thought record, how great and diuere is our flith of fiennes, not one ly that we be vncleane, but what, how great, and in how many partes is our uncleanenesse: not onely that we be debtors, but with how great debts wee be laden, and how many waies charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with how many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholly poured out himselfe before God, let him earnestly and sincerely think, that yet there remaine moe fiennes, and that the secret corners of their euils are so deep, that they cannot be thoroughly disclosed. And he cryeth out with Duid: Who vnderstandeth his errors? Lord cleane me from my hidden fiennes. Now where they affirme that fiennes are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmly conceived, and that the gate of Paradise is shut against him that neglegeth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should grant them that. For there is no other forgiueneffe of fiennes, than alwaies hath beene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their fiennes in the care of some Priest, that we read to haue obtained forgiueneffe of fiennes at Chritis hand. And truely they could not confesse, where there were neither any Priests confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time fiennes were...

forgiven without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the worde of God is plaine, which abideth for ever: Whensoever the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this word, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercy of God. For whereas they say, that judgement cannot be gien but when the cause is heard, we have a solution in readinesse, that they doe prematurely take that uppon themselves, which haue made themselves Judges. And it is a maruell that they doe so boldly frame to themselves such principles, as no man in his right wit will grant. They boast that the office of Binding and Loosning is committed to them, as though it were a certaine jurisdiction ionned with Inquisition. Moreover their whole doctrine cryeth out, that this authoritie was vnknowne to the Apostles. Neither doth it belong to the Priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainely whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as he that heareth can never know whether the reckoning be just and perfect. So should there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be judged. Moreover the whole order of Loosning standeth of Faith and Repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be gien upon another man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of Binding and Loosning is not subject to the judgement of an earthlie Judge: because the minister of the word, when he doth his office, can not give absolution but conditionallly: but that this is spoken for the sinnes taken, Whole sinnes ye forgive, &c. that they should not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the Commandement and word of God, shall be ratified in Heauen.

19 Therefore it is no maruell, if we condemn and desire to have utterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many wares hurtful to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to none, nor profite, and hath gien cause to so many wickednesse, sacrileges and errors, who will not thinke that it ought to be presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vies, which they count upon as very profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One onely they commend with a singular prerogative, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, wherby the sinner boast is for a time to come made warer, and preventeth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humble a man with shamefastneffe enough when we call him to that high judgement state of heauen, I mean to the hearing of God. It is forsooth very well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge we cast it to fin, and be not ashamed to have God winnes of our euill conference. Although the very same is also most false, for it is to be seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousneffe to sinne, than when men haueing made confession to a Priest, thinke that they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not only they are made all the yeer long the bolder to sinne, but all the rest of the yeer bearing themselves bold vp confession, they never figh unto God, they never returne to themselves, but heape sinnes vpon sinnes, till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they have once vomited them vp, they thinke them false discharged of their burden, and that they haue taken away from God the judgement that they haue gien to the Priest, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulness when they haue made the Priest prince. Moreover who doth merit see the daie of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull heart, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backwardes, like as if hee were taken by the necke and drawn to prifon? Vnlesse peraduentur be it the very Priests, that vse joyfully to delight themselves with mutuall rehearssals of their doings, as it were with merit tales? I will not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarne the full. Onely this I say, If that holy man did not vnwisely, that for one rumor of ignoration tooke away confession feiion out of the Church, yea out of the remembrance of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to be done at this day vpon infinite whore-domes, adulteries, incests, and bawdries.

20 Where the Confessioners alledge for this purpose the power of the Keies, and doe thereupon set the poupe and prore of their kingdom, as the proverbe is:
it is to be scene how much they ought to aweile. Then (say they) are the Keies gi-uen without cause? Is it said without cause. Whatacouer you loose vpon earth, shall be also loossed in Heauen? Doe we then make the word of Christ voide? I answere there was a weightie cause why the Keyes should be giuen, as both I have eu'n now already declared, and shall more plainely shew againe when I come to entreate of Excommunication. But what if I doe with one sword cut off the holde of all that they require, that is, with saying, that sacrificing Priestes are not the vicars nor succeseffors of the Apostles? But this shal also be to be intreated of in an other place: but now they raise vp an engine whereby they would most of all defend themselves, and therby may all their buildings be overthrownen. For Christ did not giue his Apostles the power to bind and loose, before that he gave them the holy Ghost. Therefore I say, that none haue the power of the keyes that have not first receiued the holy Ghost.
I deny that any man can see the Keyes but haueing the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trufling say, that they haue the holy Ghost. But indeede they deny it, vnieste peradventure they faigne (as they doe faigne indeede) the holy Ghost to be a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they shall not be beleued. And by this engine they are vitterly overthrown, that of whatsoever doore they boast that they haue the Keye, a man may alwaies aske them whether they haue the holy Ghost which is the Judge and gou-ernour of the Keies. If they answere that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghost may erre. This they will not be glad to speake expressly, although they crookedly viter the name by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no Priestes have power of the Keyes which doe commonly without consideration loose those things that the Lord would haue to be bound, and bind those things that the Lord commanded to be loosed.

21 Whereas they see themselves convinced by most clette experiments, that they doe without choise loose and bind the worthie and unworthie, they viure a power without knowledge. And though they dare not deny that knowledge is re-quiste for a good use, yet they write that the very power is giuen to call dispofers of it. But this is the power, whatsoever thou bindest or lookest in earth, shall be bound or loossed in heaven. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that haue this powner doe well binde and loose. Neither may they dally and say, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the deseruing of him that is bound or loossed. And we also conseffe, that none can be bounde or loossed, but they that are worthie to bee bound or loossed. But the Messengers of the Gospell and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this worde the Messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgivendale of sinnes in Christ by Faire they may proclaime damnation vnto all and vpon all that embrace not Christ. In this worde the Church pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, thoeres, manifley-ers, conceous men, vniust men, have no part in the kingdom of God, and bindeth such with most sure bonds. With the same worde the Church lookest them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power shal this be, to not to know what is to be bounde or loossed, and not to be able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then doe they say that they loose by auhoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vncertaine? Whay have we to doe with this imaginatue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it alreadie prooud that either there is no vse of it, or so vncertaine an vse as may be accounted for none at all. For whereas they

The uncertainties and absurdities of popish ab-,

22. If any man take exception and say, that the lawful ministers of Christ shall be no leffe doubtfull in their office, because the abolution that hangeth upon faith shall alwaie remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a cold comfort, because the minister himselfe which is no competent judge of their faith, cannot be assured of their abolution: we haue answeres thereunto in readiness. For they say that no sinnes are forgiven by the Priest, but such whereof himselfe hath bee the hearer: so by their opinion, the forgiveness hangeth upon the judgement of the Priest, and if he do not wisely discern who be worthie of pardon, the whole doing is void of and of no effect. Finally the power whereof they speake, is a jurisdiction adjoyned to examination, whereunto pardon and abolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomles depth. For where the confession is not found, the hope of pardon is also lorn, and then the Priest himselfe must needs fuckle in impence while he cannot tell, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the evil deeds. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of priests) the most part are no sitter to doe this office, than a shomaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a manner all ought worthy to suspect them selves. Hereupon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtsfullnesse of the Popes abolution, because they will haue it grounded upon the person of the Priest, and not only that, but also upon knowledge, that he may judge truly of things informed, examined and prooved. Now if a man should ask of these good doctors, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiven: I see not what they haue to answer, but that they shall be compellèd to confess that all is unprofitable, that the Priest prononceth of the forgiveness of those sinnes that he hath heard rehearsed; so long as the other sins are not deliltered from condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth how hurtfull carefulnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he refeth upon the priests discretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainly by the wordes of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleere from all these absurdities. For the abolution is conditional, that the sinner should trueth that God is mercifull vnto him, so that hee sincere ly seeketh the cleansing of his sinnes in the facienc of Christ, and obey the grace offered him. So he cannot erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclameth that which is given him in instructions by the word of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleere abolution, when that simple condition is annexed to the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that general doctrine of the matter himselfe. Be it done to thee according to thy faith, which hath been wickedly despised in the Papacie.

23 How foolishly they confonde those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of the keies, I haue promised that I will speake in another place, and ther shall be a more convenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the government.

Mach. 9. 29.

Things spoken of the Gospell and of excommunication written so. ment of the Church. But let the readers remember that those things are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secret confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they obiect that the power of loosing is given to the Apostles, which Priests may vie in forgiving sinnes acknowledged into them, it is plain that they take a false and fond principle, because the absolution that fureth Faith, is nothing else but a witness of pardon taken out of the free promis of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth upon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secrete sinnes but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they scrape together here and there testimonies, to prove that it sufficeth not to confess sinnes either to God only or to late men, yklike a Priest be the heade of them, their trauell therein is but lwed, and such as they may be ashamed of. For when the Auncient Fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselves to their owne Paffour, it cannot be expounded of particular rehearefall which then was not in vfe. Then Lombard and such like (such was their finister dealing) seeme of let purpose to have giv'n themselves to fained books, by pretence wherof they might deceiue the simple. They doe indeed truely confess, that because absolution alway accompanieth Repentance, therefore there properly remayneth no bond when a man is touch'd with Repentance, although he have not yet confess'd, and therefore that then the Priest doth not so much forgive sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Albiet in the word of declaring they sleely bring in a profic eerror, thrusting a ceremony in stead of doctrine. But whereas they patch vnto it, that he is absolved in the face of the Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they doe inconvenience draw to the peculiar vfe of every particular man, that which wee have alreadie faide to be appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a haminous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they deprave and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgiving, with an enioying of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they pretumpctuously claime to owne ownnes a power to part that in haffes, which God hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when he simply requireth Repentance and Faith, this partition or exception is a very robberie of God. For it is in effect as much as if the Priest takeing upon him the person of a Tribune, shou'd become interceffor to God and would not suffer God of his meere liberallitie to receive him into fauour, that hath liuen profcrate before the Tribunes seates and there hath been punished.

24. The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they wil make God the Author of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falsehoode condemned, as I have proued them false forgers in the fewe places that they alleagde. But sith it is cvident that it is a Law made by men, I say that it is both tyrannicall and made inu죌ously against God, who binding mens confences to his word, will have them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a neceffitie prescribed of that thing which the Lord would to be free, I say that this is a sacrilege not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgive sinnes, wherein confessith salvation for vs. Moreover I have shewed that this tyrannie was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthy barbarousnefe. I have also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore foules in whom foucer abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carleffnes, delighteth them with vain flatteries, and so maketh them duller. Last of all I have declared, that whatsoever mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and depraye pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitfull colours.

25. The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that ever they babble may be overthrown with one word. They say that it is not enough
Cap. 4. Of the manner how to receive

1. [Scripture citations]

The faith which holdeth Christ to be the propitiation for our sins cannot stand with the doctrine which teacheth satisfaction to be made by us for sins committed after baptism.

enough for him that repenteth, to abstinence from his former evils, and change his behaviour into better, unless he make satisfaction to God for those things that he hath done: And that there be many helps by which we may redeem our sins, as weepings, fastings, oblations and the works of charity. With these we must winne the Lord to be favorable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousnesse of God, with these we must make amends for our faults, with these wee must defend pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercie he hath forgiven our fault, yet by the discipline of his justice he retaineth the paine, & that this is the paine that must be redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they saie commeth to this point, that wee doe in deed obtaine pardon of our sinnes at the meritudinesse of God, but by means of the dispersing of our workes, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompenced, that due satisfaction may be fully made to God's rightouesnesse.

Against such lies, I set the free forgiveness of sinnes, than which there is nothing more evidently spoken of in the Scripture. First, what is forgiveness, but a gift of meruc lliberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgive, that acknowledgeth by acquittance that the money is paiute, but he that without any payement willingly of his owne libcraltie cancelleth the debtors bond. Secondly, why is this word, freely, added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore do they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thundebolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Esiae, It is I, it is I, that do put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindful of thy sinnes: doeth hee not openly declare that he fetcheth the caufe & foundation of forgiveness only from his own goodies? Moreover whereas the whole scripture beareth this witness of Christ, that forgiveness of sins is to be received by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then do they teach that it is received by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they deny that they give this to satisfactions, although they say that the fame be visd as helps by way of meane. For whereas the scripture faith By the name of Christ, c'meane the that we bring nothing, we allege nothing of our owne, but rest upon the only commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirmeth that God is reconciling the world to himselfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sinnes, he immediatly sheweth the meane and manner how, because he that was without sinne, was made sinne for vs.

26 But (such is their persuasion:) they say that both forgiveness of sinnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme received into the favour of God by Christ: that after Baptisme we must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ preseth nothing, but so far as it is distributed by the keys of the Church. Neither do I speake of a doubtfull matter, forasmuch as they have in most euident writings bewrayed their owne filthines, and not one or two of them, but all the Schoolemen vniterfully. For their matter after that he had confesseth that Christ had paid the penalité of sinnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediately correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in Baptisme all temporal penaliies of sinnes are released, but after Baptisme they are minimized by the helpe of penance, that so the crose of Christ and our penance may worke together. But John faith forre otherwise, if any sin, we have an advocate with the father, even Jesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our sinnes; I wrote unto you children, because your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. Truly, hee speaketh to the faithfull, to whom when he saith forth Christ to be the propitiation of sinnes, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God being displeased, may be made fauourable and appeased. He doth not saye: God was once reconciled unto you by Christ, nowe seek you other meane, but hee maketh him a perpetuell advocate, alway to restore vs by his intercession into the favour of his father: a perpetuell propitiation, by which our sinnes may be cleansed away. For this is ever true that the other John saith: Behold, the Lamb of God, behold him that taketh away the sins of the world. He taketh them away (both he) himselfe and none other, that is to say, forasmuch as he alone is the Lamb of God, he alone also is the oblation for sinnes, he alone the propitiatory sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgive belongeth properly to the father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the sonne, as we have alreadie seen: Christ is heere set in another degree, that taking upon him selfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltieffe before the judgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shall no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, unless the same honour remaine whole with him, which they do wrongfully take to themselves that go about to appease God with their owne recompenings.

27 And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and vitimished: and that the consistences being assured of the forgiuenesse of sinne, may haue peace with God. Esaie faith, that the father hath laide the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that we should be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes faith: that Christ did in his body beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Paul wrieth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sin for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sin was sinne in his flesh, when he was given to be a sacrifice, vpon the whole heape of our sinnes with all their maldictiion and curse, with the dreadfull judgement of God, and condemnation of death should be cait. Heere those trullings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, every one of vs doth none otherwise feel the effectualnes of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the onely satisfaction of Christ. Nowesete before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuenesses of sinnes: that if we afterwaerde fall, to the obtaining of a second forgiuenesse our workes do worke with it. If these things may haue place, do these things that are heere before alligned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It is a marvellous great difference, betwixt this that our iniquities are laid vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, and this that they are cleansed by our owne workes: between this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if we speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to heare that his sinnes are redeemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shall alwaie bee vexed, & alway quafe for fear. For they that reft vpon light pettie satisfactions, do too contemnouly finde the judgement of God, and doe little consider how great is the greatness of sinne, as we shall declare in another place. But although we grant them to redeem some sinnes with just satisfaction: yet what will they do when they are oppressed with so many sinnes, for satisfaction whereof in hundred lies although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuenesse of sinnes is affirmed, do not belong to younglings, but to the already regenerate children of God, and them that have beene long nourished in the botome of the Church. That embassage which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had bin already regenerate. But he, bidding satisfactions farewel, fendeth them to the croffe of Christ. So when he wrieth to the Colossians, that Christ by the bloud of the croffe hath pacified all things in heaven or in earth, he restrained not this to the onely moment wherein we are received into the church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easly appeareth by the proccesse of the text, where he faith, that the faithfull have a redemption by the bloud of Christ, that is forgiuenesses of sinnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together more places, that readily readily offer themselves to be found.

28 Here they flee to the sanctuary of the foolish distinction, that some sins are venial, and some deadly: that for deadly sins there is great satisfaction due, that venial sins are purged with more easie remedies, as with saying of the Lords prayer, with springling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and tafle with God. But whereas they alwaye have in their mouth veniall and deadly sinne, yet they could not deeme the one from the other, seeing they make vngodlines and vnccleanness of harte veniall sinne. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) doe pronounce, that the reward of sinne is death, and that the foule that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the sinnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they do not deserve death, but because by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I knowe how vnitly they flander this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoiks strange conclusion, concerning the equallitie of sinnes. But they shall easily be convinced by their owne mouth. For I demand of them, whether among the very same sinnes that they confess to be deadly, they doe not acknowledge one to bee greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately followe, that sinnes are equall, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitively saith, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obedience of the Law is the way of life, and that the transgression of the lawe is death, they cannot escape this sentence. What ende of satisfying then will they finde in so great a heap of sinnes? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sin, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrap them selves in many sins, Sith the infeste man paffeth no day wherein he faileth not many times. Nowe when they shall prepare themselves to make satisfaction for the sinnes, they shall have vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfying being cut off, what do they stay upon? how dare they still scarce of satisfying?

29 They goe about to winde out themselves: but (as the proverbe is) the water still cleauneth vp them. They forge a distinction of fault and penalty. They confesse that the fault is forgien by the mercie of God, but that when the fault is forgien, the penalty remaineth which the righteousnes of God requirith to be paied; and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the releafe of the penalty. Good God, what a skipping lightnes is this? now they confesse that the forgivenes of the fault lieth freely open for men which sometime they teach men to defence with praiers and weepings, and all other kinds of preparations But yet still all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgivenes of sinnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I think not that I have alreadie more then sufficiently confirmed, yet I will add some other testimonies wherewith these winding shakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not be able once to solde in the toppe of their tail. This is the new Testament which the Lorde hath convened with vs in Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learn by another Prophet, where the Lord faith: If the righteous turne away from his righteousnesse, I will not remember all his righteousnesse. If the wicked depart from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he faith that he will not remember their righteousnesse, that is as much to say, that he will have no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember sinnes, is as much as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behind his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such manners of speeche the holy Ghost doth plainly express his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing cares to learne. Truely, if God do punish sinnes, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to judgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine examine them: he doth not cast them behind his backe: if he looke upon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if he lift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordeis. If God have covered finnes, then he would not looke upon them: if he would not looke upon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not knowe them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that finnes were covered, that they should not bee seen? What was meant by this that God did see finnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of another place of the prophet, vpon what conditions the Lord for- gueth finnes. If (faith he) your finnes be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snowe: if they be red like crimson, they shall be as wooll. And in Jeremiy we read thus: In that day the iniquity of Iacob shall be fught for, and shall not be found: the finne of Iudah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remnantts that I shall preferue. Wilt thou briefly understand what is the meaning of those wordeis? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth binde vp iniquities in a sacke, doth gather them into a bundell and lay them vp, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an adamant stone. If they signifie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shall be given for recompence, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lord affirmeth, that hee remitteth all recompensing of vengeance. Here I must beseech the Reader not to harken to my glosses, but onely that they will suffer the word of God to take some place.

What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for finnes? For when we say that he did bear all our finnes in his bodie vpon the tree, we meane nothing else thereby, but that he suffered all the paine and punishment that was due unto our finnes. And the same hath Esay more luyly declared where he faith: the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vpon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to finnes: and which we should have suffered before that we could be reconciled to God, vnillese hee had entred into our stead? Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffered the finnes of finnes, to deliver them that he is from them. And lo oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Christ, he vtheth to call it in Greeke Apotatorfin, whereby he meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the verie price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gave him selfe Antiltron, a price of ransome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lord (faith Augustine), but satisfaction? And what satisfaction is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death in Christ? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of finnes, miniftreth vs a strong battell rammme. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that manner of satisfying, but requireth the wholserecompence in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth most diligently and in most exact oder let out all the ceremonies of expiation, Howe commeth it to passe, that he commandeth to recompence faules committed, with no worke at all, but requireth onely sacrifices for satisfaction, but because his will is to declare, that there is onely one kind of satisfaction, whereby his judgement is appeased? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were effected by their truth, that is to faie, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what manner of recompence the Lorde receueth of vs, after hath verie well exprest in few words. They shall (faith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, here is forgiveness of finnes. And we shall pay thee the calues of our lippes: Loe, here is satisfaction. I knowe that they doe subtly slippe away, when they make distinction betweene euylasftng paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of punishment that God taketh as well of the bodie as of the soule, except onely euylasftng death, this restraining of it doth little helpe them. For the places that we have above recited, do expresslie meaneth this, that God receiueth vs into favour with this condicion, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the paine whatsoever we had thereby defered. And so oft as David or the other Prophets doe crave pardon of vsines, they doe alio therewithall pray to be released of the paine. Yea, the very feeling of Gods judgement doth drive them thereof. Again, when they promise mercy at the Lords hand, they do in manner alwaye of purpose preach of the paines and the forgiveneesse thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezekiel pronounceth that he will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne sake, not for the fewes sake, he doth sufficientlie shew that both are of free gift. Finally, if we be delivered by Christ from guiltines of fault, the paines that come thereof, must needs cease.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arme themselves with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of arguments those be that they allege. David (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie and manslaughter, received pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterward punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotte by that adulterie. We are taught to redeeme with satisfactions such paines as were to be extended after forgiveneesse of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeeme his sinnes with almes. And Solomon writeth that for equity and godlineesse, iniquities are forguen. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of vsines is covered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth. Again, in Luke the Lord saith, this was a woman, that many sinnes are forguen her, because she hath loved much. How peruerse and wrongfully they euer whey the doings of God, But if they had marked (as they should not have overpassed it) that there are two kindes of Gods judgement, they would have seene in this rebuking of David, a farre other maner of punishment,than such as might be thought to tend to reuenge. But because, it is not a little behooueth vs all to vnderstand whereunto the chastisements have respect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our sinnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shall be not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kinde of judgement, the judgement of reuenge, the other of Chastisement. It is to be understood, that God so pursueth his enemies with the judgement of reuenge, that he vseth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is joyned with his indignation: with the judgement of chastisement he dealeth not so cruelly, as to be angry, nor pursueth to destroy, nor setteth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the dooming of a ludge, the other of a Father. For the ludge when he pursueth an euill doer, he hath regard to the offence, and pursueth the very fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correceth his childe, he doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teach him, and make him warier in time to come. Chastisement in a certaine place vseth a similitude somewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the same point. The sonne (say he) is beaten, and the servant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bondervaine, because he hath offended, and the other is chastised as a free man and as a sonne, needing correction. To the one this correction sheweth for proofe and amendment, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter shortly and in a ready summe, let this be the first of two distinctions. Wherefoer punishment is to reuenge, there sheweth itselfe the curse and wrath of God, which he alway withholdeth from the faithful. Contrariwise, Chastisement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimonie of his love, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commonly euyery where sufficiently sufficiently expressed in the word of God. For whatsoever afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out unto vs as it were a certain picture of hell, from whence they do already see a farre off their eternal damnation: and they are so farre from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginnings they are prepared to the most cruel hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chastising chastiseth his servants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confess that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vs true instruction. But as we read every where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quiet minde, so they have alway praied to escape the first kind of scourges. Chastise me Lord (faith Jeremio) but in thy judgement, not in thy wrath, lest thou destroy me. Pour out thy wrath vpon the nations that have not knowne thee, and vpon the kingdoms that have not called vpon thy name. And David faith: Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth their sinnes. As in Esay: I will confesse to thee O Lord, because thou hast been angry with me: thy wrath is turned, and thou haue comforted me. Againse Abaca. Thou that hast beene angry shall remember mercy. And Miche: I will bear the wrath of the Lord, because I haue sinned against him. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are unjustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but alio that the faithfull haue afferwage of their sorrow, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is saide that he doth desile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he will never desile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheth, but of the vehement feeling of sorrow which they feele that suffer any of his feueritie whatsoever it be. But he not onely pricketh his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes do woundeth them, that they thinke themselves not farre from the damnation of hell. So he testifieth that they haue deferred his wrath, and so it behoueth that they shoulde loue themselves in their euils, and bee touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make haste to crave pardon. But even in the very same dooing he sheweth a more evident testimonie of his favourable kindnesse than of his wrath. For the covenant continueth that was made with vs in our true Solomon: the truth whereof he that cannot decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall never bee made voide. If (faith he) his children forsake my lawe, and walke not in my judgement: if they defile my statutes, and keepe not my commandements; I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Of which mercy to make vs assured, he faith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the poffetties of Solomon, shall be of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which claues when he meaneth moderation and lenity, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but he confounded with extreme and deadly honours, that feele the hand of God to be against them. How great regard he hath of this lenity in chastising his Israel, hee sheweth in the Prophet: I haue purged thee (faith he) in fire: But not as Siluer; for then thou shouldst haue beene all consumed. Albeit he teacheth that chastisements servue him for to cleene him, but he further faith, that hee vseth the same so temperately, that hee be not too much consumed by them. And that is needfull. For the more that every man reverently feareth God, and gieuth himselfe to follow godlines, so much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath, for the reprobate, although they goe under his scourges, yet for that they weigh not the cause, but rather turne their backe both to their owne sinnes & to the judgement of God, by that outwidsnesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmur and kicke against him, and doe make an vprote against their judge, that furious sudden rage afflieth them with madness and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descend to consider their sinnes, and being staken with

with dread and horror, they flee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, unless the Lord did allwaie these sorrows wherewith the poore soules torment themselves, they would faint a hundred times even in small tokens of his wrath.

33 Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are stricken with the scourges of God, they do already after a certaine maner begin to suffer pains by his judgement, and though they shall not escape unpunished, for that they have not taken heede to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but only that, to their great hurt, they should prove God to be a judge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they should thereby be punished of God for their sinnes, but that they should thereby profit to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather have respect to the time to come, then to the time past. This I had rather express in Chrysostomes words than mine owne. For this (faith he) God doth lay paine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And to faith Augustine: That which thou suffrest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chastisement and no damnation. But not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Knowe ye brethren that all this miferie of mankinde when the world groweth in medicine all sorrow, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I have therefore thought good to alleage, that the manner of speech that I have aboue written, should not seeme to any man new and strange. And hereunto serue all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lord oftentimes doth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffly despise all punishments. In Esay he faith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to the crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shall be sufficient to have briefly flowed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingsdome, he punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from David his yong inne, hee corrected him to amendment. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul faith, we are judged of the Lord, we are corrected that we should not be damned with this world: That is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heavenly father, this is no paine wherewith we should be confounded, but only a chastisement wherewith we should be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainly on our side. For he teacheth that the paines wherewith men are alike chastised by God, are diversely to be considered: because to the holy ones they are battels and exercices after the forgiveness of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiveness paines of wickednesse. In which place he rehearseth how paines were laide upon David and other godly men, and faith, that the same tended to this ende, that their godlinesse should by such humbling of them, be exercised and provoked. And where Esay faith, that the Jewish people had their iniquitie forgiven them, because they had received full chastisement at the Lords hande: this prooueth not that the pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the full payment of the paine: but it is in effect as much as if he had faide: Because ye haue already suffered paines enough, and by the greeuousnesse and multitude thereof haue beene now pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is now time that receiuing the tidings of full mercie, your harts should rejoyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the person of a father, which repenteith him euyn of his just feuerite, when he was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessarie that the faithfull be furnished in bitternesse of afflictions. It is time that the judgement began at the house of the Lorde, in which his name is called vpon. What should the children of God doe, if they did beleue the feuerite of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For he that being striken stricken by the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing judge; cannot conceive him but angry and enimic vs to him, and detest the verie scourge of God as a curse and damnation. Finally, he can never be perswaded that God loueth him, that shall think him so minded toward him, that he is still minded to punish him. But he only profesteth under the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angry with his sinnes, but mercifully and loving to himselfe. For otherwise that must necesse happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he, where, Faith. Why wrathes, O God have paffed over me; thy terror hath opprest me. Also that which Moses writeth, because we have faunted in thy wrath: and we have beene troubled in thy indignation, thou haft set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secrets in the light of thy countenance: because all our dayes are done away in thy wrath: our yeeres are consumed as the word that is paffed out of a mouth. On the other side David faith thus of his fatherly chaffements, to teach that the faithfull are rather holpen than opprest thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected: O Lord, and hast instrued in thy law, to give him quiet from cuill dayes, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a hard tentation, when God sparing the vnbelieuers and winking at their faults, feeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gaueth them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learne, that it is done to provide for their saluation when they are called againe into the way, and the wicked are caried headlong into their errors, whose end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be everlafting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and ficknes, as the judgement of eternall death are the curfes of God: when they are laid vpon men to this end, to be instruments of the Lords wrath and vengeance against the reprobate.

35 Now (as I thynke) all men do perceiue whereby tended that chaffement of the Lord vpon David: even to be an instruccion that God is greuously displeased with manslaughter and adulterie, against which he had swewed so great indignation in his beloved and faithfull seruant: that David should be taught to be no more so bold to do the like deed: and not to be a sinner whereby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be judged of the other kind of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a fore pestilence, for Davids disobedience whereinto he was fallen in numbring the people. For he did in deed freely forgive to David the guiltlesse of his sinner: but because it pertainned both to the publicke examples of all ages, and also to the humbling of David, that such a hainous offence should not remaine unpunished: therefore he most sharply chastised him with his rod. Which marke alio we ought to haue before our eyes in the vniuerfall course of mankind. For whereas after pardon obtained, we do all yet suffer the miseries that were laid vpon our first parent for sinnen we perceiue our felues by such exercitie to be admonished, how greuously God is displeased with the transgression of his law: that being throwne downe and humbled with knowledge in confience of our owne miserable estate, we may the more seuerely aspire to the blessednes. But he shall be most foolish that shall thinke, that the calamities of this present life are laid vpon vs for the guiltines of sinne. And that I thynke was the meaning of Chrysfone when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines vpon vs, that he should call vs, persecuering in euils to repentance, then wher repentance is once swewed, the paine shall be superfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for every mans nature, so he handleth one man more roughly, and another with more lenye tenderenes. Therefore where he mindeth to teach that he is not vnmeasurable in taking punishments, he reproocheth to the hard hearted and obstinate people that being straken yet they make not an end of sinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was a cake scorched on the one side, and raw on the other, because the corrections did not pearce into their minde, that the people hauing their vices boilded.

boiled out, might be made meere to receive pardon. Truely he that so speaketh, fieweth, that to soone as a man hath repented, he will by and by become appeasable; and that by our stifnes he is enforced to that rigour in chastifing of faults, which should have bene prevented with willing amendment. Yet forasmuch as we all are of such hardnesse and rudenesse, as vnloisfully needeth chastisement: it seemed good to him being a most wise Father, to exercise all without exception with a common scourage all our life long. But it is mereuellous why they so call their eyes upon the only example of David, and are not moued with so many examples, in which they might have beholde free forgiveness of sinnes. It is read that the Publicane went out of the Temple justified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his tears we reade (fr. Ambrose) his satisfaction we reade not. And the man sike of the Palsie heard it spoken to him: Rize: thy sinnes are forgiven thee. There was no paine layd upon him. All the absolutions that are rehearded in the Scripture, are set out as giuen freely. Out of this great number of examples a rule should rather have beene gathered, than of that only example that containeth in it a certaine speciall matter.

36 Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counselleth Nabuchadnezzer to redeem his sinnes with righteounes, and his inquiries with pitying of the poore: his meaning was not to lay, that righteounesse and mercy are satisfactorie appeasements of God, and redemption of penances (for God forbid that there were ever any redemption lacking only the blood of Christ) but to referre this word Redeeming rather to men than to God, as if he had sayd: O king, thou haft vised an vnrighteous and violent government, thou haft oppressed the humble, thou haft spoile the poore, thou haft hardlie and vniustlie handled thy people: for thy vniust exactions, for thy violence and oppression, now render to them mercy and righteounes. Likewise Salomon faith, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is covered: not before God, but among men themeselves. For thus is the whole verse: Hadred raffeth vp contentions, but charitie couereth all iniquite. In which verse, as his manner is, he doth by way of comparison of contraries, compare the evils that grow of hatreds, with the fruits of charitie: in this meaning, they that hate together, do one bite, barke at, reproch and raile at an other, and turne all things to the worst, but they that love together, do dissemble many things among themeselves, do winke at many things, and pardon many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, and helpeth them with admonishing, rather than galleth them with reproaching them. And it is not to be doubted that Peter alleageth this place in the same sentence, vnlke we will accuse him of depraving and wrongfully wresting the scripture. But whereas he teacheth that sin is purged with mercifulnes and liberalitie, he doth not meane that recompence is therewith made for sin before the face of the Lord, so that God being appeased by such satisfaction doth release the paine that otherwise he would have laid upon them, but after the accustomed manner of the Scripture he declareth that they shall finde him mercifull unto them that leaue their former vices and iniquities, doe turne to him by godlines and truth: as if he should saie, that the wrath of God doth cease and his judgement rest, when we cease from our enill doings. Neither doth he there describe the cause of pardon, but rather the manner of true conversion. As manytimes the Prophets do declare that Hypocrites do in vaine pester God with forged ceremonious visages in stead of repentence, whereas it is vprightnesse of life with the duties of charitie that delighteth him. As alfo the author of the Epistle to the Hebreues commending liberalitie and gentlenesse, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And when Christ, taunting the Pharises that giving heed to only to cleansing of dishes, they neglected the cleaneof cleanness pleasest God. Of which kind of speech we have intreated in another place.

37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sound judgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, will make vs any controversy thereupon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not know the woman which he had so easily received into his presence. For he thought that Christ would not have received her, if he had known her such a sinner as she was. And thereby he gathered, that Christ was not a Prophet that might in such sort be deceived. The Lord, to frewe that she was no sinner to whom her sinnes was alreadie forgiven, did put out this parable. There were two dotters to one creditor upon visita; the one ought fifty, the other ought five hundred, both had their debts forgiven them. Whether oweth more thanke? the Pharisee answeres: he to whom most is forgiven. The Lord replied: learne hereby that this woman's sinnes are forgiven her, because she hath loued much. In which words (as you see) he maketh not her loue the cause, but the proofe of the forgiveness of her sinnes. For they are derived upon a similitude of that debtor, to whom five hundred was forgiven, to whom he did not say that therefore it was forgiven, because he had much loued: but therefore much loued, because it was forgiven. And hereunto must that similitude be applied in this sort: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner: but thou oughtest to know that she is none such, for as much as her sinnes be forgiven her. And that her sinnes be forgiven her, her loue ought to prooue vnto thee, whereby the rendereth thankes for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effecte, whereby any thing is produc'd by signes enuining. By what meanes she obtained forgiveness of sinnes, the Lord openly testifieth: Thy faith, faith he, hath fauced thee. Therefore we obtaine forgiveness by faith: By charitie we give thankes, and testifie the bountifullness of the Lord.

38 As for those things that are commonly found in the booke of olde writers concerning satisfaction, they little moue me. I see indeed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whose booke remaine, have either erred in this point, or spoken too crabbly and hardly: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and viscultul as to have written those things in that fense that the new Satisfactioners do read them. Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercie is required, examination ceaseth: where mercie is asked, judgement is not rigorous: where mercie is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercie, there is no inquisition. Where is mercie, the answer is pardoned. Which words howsoever they be wrested, yet they can never be made to agree with the schoolemens doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiasticall doctrines, which is gathered vpon Augustine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was faide to be giv'n in recompence of sinnes committed, was even in those times laughted to scorn: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a holy inuine in abstaining from sinnes in time to come. I will not allege that which the fame Chrysostome faith, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we should confess our sinnes vnto him with teares (though such sentences are manie times found in his writings and others. Augustine in deede in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obtaine forgiveness of sinnes: but because no man should stumble at that little word, he himselfe preuenteth it in another place. The fleth of Christ (faith he) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not onely these sinnes that are wholly put away in baptism, but also these that afterward crepe in by weakesnes: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, forgive us our trespasses. And they are forgiven by that singular sacrifice.

39 They have for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to be Defenders of Popish satisfactions not much holpen by the writings of the ancient Fathers.

rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had bin excommunicate when they would be received againe to the communion, did atertaine the Church of their repentance. For there were joined unto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might perswade men that they were truly and heartily weane of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former doings: and so they were faide to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that ancient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day used, took their beginning. Truely vnder vnderstanding the which is brought to palle, that there remaineth not so much as a shadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I said even now, I do not deny that peraduenture they erred herein. But those things that were beprinkled with a fewe spots, when they are once handled with these mens unwa ded hands, are altogether defiled. And if we muft contend with the authority of old writers: good God, what old writers do they thrust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath boathed vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnflorie dotages of certaine Monkes that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine and Christifme. As about this present question he taketh in a manner all out of Augustines booke of repentance, which is foolishly boathed of good and bad by some feraper togethe. It bareth indeede the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I doe not so narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that tediousnes. For to me it should not be vrie labourfome, and yet vrie plaufile to bewray to their great shame those things that they have hetherfoere boasted vpon as mysteries, but because my purpose is to teach fruitfully, therefore I palle them over.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatorie.

O Vt of this doctrine of satisfactions do flowe indulgences or pardons. For they say that that which our power wanteth to make satisfactor, is supplie by these pardons. And they run so furthe into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merits of Chrift and of the Martyres, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his bulles. But although they have more neede of Hellesborus to purge their fretfull braine, then argumentes to asswirve them, so that it is not much woor-thie the trauail to stende vpon confuting such trifling errours, which are alreadie shaken with many bateramnes, and of themselues growe into decayed age, and bende toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shall be pro-fitale for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons have so long stund safe, and have so long beene vnpunished, having beene vfed with so outrageous and furious licentiousnes: this may seue to teach vs in how darke a night of errours, men in certaine ages past haue beene drowned. They saw themselues to be openly and uncolouredly scorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainful markets to be made of the saluation of their soules, the price of saluation to be vauued at a fewe pence, and nothing set out to be freely given: that by this colour they bee wiped of offerings to be filthily spent vpon brothels, bawds and bankruptings, that the greatest blowers abroad of pardons are the greatest delphers of them, that this monsiter doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnes overcome the whole, and growe into outrage, and that there is no ende, newe leade daily, dayly brought, and new money gotten. Yet with his reverence they received, they worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest few somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceivers, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit: At the length, since the world suffered itself to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe cold, and by little and little become frozen, till they utterly vanish away.

2. Forasmuch as many that see the filthie garments, the deceits, theftes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners have herebefore mocked and beguiled vs, yet see not the very fountain of vngodliness from whence they spring: it is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spots. They call the treasure of the Church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principal custodie of this barne (as I haue already touched) they faine to be deliuered to the Bishop of Rome, that he should haue the distribution of so great gifts, that he might both give them by himselfe, and also grantJurisdiction to other to give them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeeres: from the Cardinalls, pardons for a hundred daies: from Bishops, pardons for fourtie daies. But they be (as I may naturally descride them) the profaning of the blood of Christ, Sainctes moccari, to lead away the Christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of salvation. For how could the blood of Christ be more filthily profaned, than when it is denied to suffice to the remission of finnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, unlesse the want thereof as being withered and wafted, should be otherwise supplied and perfected? The law and all the Prophets (faith Peter) bare witnesse of Christ, that by him forgiuenesse of sin is to be receiued: Pardons gie remission of finnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The blood of Christ (faith John) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons doe make the blood of Martyrs the wafting away of finnes. Christ (faith Paul) which knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sin, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him: Pardons doe set the satisfaction of finnes in the blood of Martyrs. Paul cried out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the pardons prononce, that Paul and other died for vs. In an other place he saith that Christ purchased the Church with his blood: the pardons appoint an other price of purchase in the blood of Martyrs. The Apostle saith, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for ever them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrarie and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. John saith that all the Saintes washed their Gownes in the blood of the Lambe: the pardons teach men to wash their Gownes in blood of Saintes.

3. Leo Bishop of Rome, writeth notable well to the Palesstines against these sacrilege. Although (faith he) the death of many Saintes hath beene precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath beene the propituation of the world. The righteous received, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithfull are grauen examples of patience, not gifts of righteousness. For their deathes were every one singular to themselves, and none of them did by his end pay the debt of an other, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthie to be remembred) he repeated in an other place. There can nothing be required more plaine to destroy this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no leffe figly to the same effect. Though (faith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the blood of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiuenesse of finnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that we should follow him, but hath giuen vs a thing to rejoice vpon. Again in an other place, As onely the Sonne of God was made the Sonne of Man, to make vs with him the Sonnes of God: so he alone

A a 2 for

for vs hath taken vpon him punishment without cull deferenings, that wee by him might without good deferenings, obtaine grace not due vnto vs. Truely whereas all their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacrifacies and blaphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember them selfes whether there be not their decrees: that the martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and defered more, than was needfull for themselfes: and that they had remaining so great a plenty of deferenings, as did also overflown vnto other: and that therefore, leaft so great goodnes shoule should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, & of both these blouds is made the treasur of the Church, for the remission and satisfaction of sins. And that fo is the saying of Paul to be taken: I supplie in my body those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his body, which is the Church. What is this else, but to leave Christ onely his name, otherwife to make him but a common petie fame, that may scarcely among the multitude bee knowne from the rest? Hee onely, onely shoulde have beene preached, he onely forsooth, he onely named, he onely beene looked vnto, when the obtaining of forgiveness of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of: But let vs heare their curtalled arguments: Leaft the blood of the Martyrs should be flipt in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefite of the Church. Is it fo? was it no profite to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their bloud? by defying this present life, to testify that they fought for a better life? by their steadfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, and overcome the stubbornnesse of the enimes? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profite of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely be the propitiator, if he onely died for our sins, if he onely was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might needlesse have obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beds. And whereas they have fought euen to the shedding of their bloud, it woulde not agree with the justice of God to leave the fame barren and fruitlesse. As though God could not telhowe to increafe in his servants their glory, according to the measure of his gifts. But the church receiueth in common together profite enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

4. But how maliciously doe they wret their place of Paul where he faith, that he supplie in his body those things that wanted of the sufferings of Christ? For bee referret hernot the default of supplying to the worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation: but to those afflications wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to saying, all the faithful must be exercised so long as they shall be in this flesh. Hee faith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he daily sufferrith in his members the fame that he once sufferrith in himselfe. Christ vouchsafteth to doe vs so great honour, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. Whereas Paul adde these words, For the Church, hee meaneth not for the redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profite of the Church. As in another place he faith, that he sufferrith all things for the electe, that he may obteine the saluation which is in Christ Iesus. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that he sufferrith all the troubles that he sufferrith, for their comfort and saluation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when hee saith further, that he was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospell of Christ. If they yet require another expostor, let them heare Augustine. The sufferings of Christ (faith he) are in Christ onely as in the head: and both in Christ & the Church, as in the whole bodie. Whereby Paul being one member faith, I supplie in my body that which wanteth in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore if thou whatsoever thou be that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferrist of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wanteth in the sufferings. sufferings of Christ. But wherunto the sufferings of the Apostles taken for the Church of Christ do tend, he expoundeth in an other place where he saith: Christ is to me the gate vnto you: because ye are the sheepe of Christ bought with his blood: acknowledge your price, which is not gien of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth, As he hath gien his soule, so ought we to giue our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and conforme faith. These are Augustines words. But God forbid, that Paul Rom.5.15. should have thought that any thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnes of righteousness, salvation and life, or that he meant to add any thing thereunto, which is plainly and honorably preacheth, that the abundance of grace was so largely powerd out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it alone all the Saints have bene saued, and not by the merite of their own life or death as Peter expressly testified: so that he should be laufherso against God and Christ, that should repose the worthines of any Sainthe any where else than in the one ly merite of God. But why doe I carry hereupon any longer, as upon a matter yet doubtfull, sith the very bewraying of such monstrous errors is a sufficient conflagration of them?

5. Now (to passe over such abominations) who taught the Pope to encloure in lead and parchement the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distribut ed by the worde of the Gospell? Truely either the Gospell of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospell, with all abundance of heavenly benifites, with all his merites, with all his righteousness, wife dome and grace, without any exception, Paul wittnelefeth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deluiered to the minifters, whereby they might vfe this forme of meffage as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: we befech you, be ye so reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sinne, to be made sin for vs, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. And the faithfull know of what value is that common par-taking of Christ, which (as the fame Apostle wittnelefeth) is offered vs to be enjoyed in the Gospell. Contrariwise the pardons doe bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, and fasten it to lead parchement, yea and to a certaine place, and feuer it from the worde of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to have proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could bare, they which felt themselves about measure oppressed with penance enjoyned them, required of the Church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompenes whereby men may redeem themselves from the judgement of God, then they therewithall did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatory remedies, to deluier vs from defcerpt punishements. As for these blasphemers that we have recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can have no colour at all.

6. Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed downe, and overthrown from the vnc foundations. For I doe not agree to some men, that thinke best to desire in this point, and make no mention at all of Purgatorio, whereupon (as they say) great conten tions doe arife, but small edification is gotten. Truely I my selfe would also thinke such tafles worthie to be negligently passed over, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as Purgatorio is builded of many blasphemers, and is daily vpholden with new blasphemers, and raiseth vp many and grievous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might after a while have been dissimuled for a time, that it was invented by curious and bold rauine without the worde of God: that men beleued of it by I wot not: what revelations, fained by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested.

Albeit

Albeit the Lord giueth not leave to mans presumptuousnes so to breake into the secret places of his judgements, and hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for truth at dead men, neglecting his worde, and permitted not his worde to be so vnreurently defiled. But let vs grant, that all those things might for a while haue bene borne with, as things of no great importence. But when the cleansing of sins is fought else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must criue out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throte and sides: that Purgatorio is the damnable deceit of Satan, that it maketh voide the Cross of Christ, that it layeth an intollerable slander upon the mercie of God, that it freebleth and overthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorio among them, but the satisfaction that the foules of men departed do pay after their death? So that overthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorio is immediately out heauen by the vorie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than evident that the blood of Christ is the onely satisfaction, propitiatory sacrifice, and cleansing for the sins of the faithfull: what remaineth but that Purgatorio is a meere and horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe over the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we feete to have come out of the same spring of vngodines.

But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they haue falsly and wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lorde affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost should not be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he tellueth that there is a forgiveness of some sinnes in the world to come. But who seeth not that the Lorde there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Now if it be so, what is that to their purgatorio for as much as by their opinion the pain is there fluxed of those sinnes, whereof they deny not the fault to be forgiven in this present life? But that they may no more carpe against vs, they shall haue yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from loo haunous wickednes, he thought it not ynot to say that it should never be forgiven, but the more to amplifie it, he vned a diuision, wherein he comprehended both the judgement that every mans conscience feelith in this life, & the last judgement that shall be openly pronounced at the resurrection: as though he should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of most present damnation. For he that of set purpose hath endeauoured to quench the light of the holy Ghost, shall not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to sinners for their conversion, nor in the last day when the lambs shall be feathered by the Angels of God from the goates, and the kingdom of heaven shall be cleansed from all offinches. Then they bring forth that parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine adversary, leaft he deluere thee to the Judge, and the Judge to the Sargeant, & the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get our, vnntill thou haue paied the uttermost farthing. If in this place the judge do signifie God, and the adversary plainly the duell, the Sargeant the Angell, and the prison purgatorio, I will gladly yeele them. But if it be evident to all men, that Christ meant there to shew into how many dangers and mischieues they cast themselues, that had rather obstatibly pursue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equity and good right, to the end to exhort his discipels the more earnestly to agreement with equity: where then I pray you shall Purgatorio be found?

They fetch an argument out of the saying of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heaven, earth, and hells, shall bow to Christ. For they take it as confesse, that hells cannot there be meant of those that are adjudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatorio. They did not reason verie eulke, if the Apostle did by kneeling meane the true godly worshipping. But if he teacheth onely, that there is dominion giuen to Christ.
Christ, whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what proof is there to the contrary, but that we may by holy understatand the Devils, that shall bee brought before the judgment of God, to acknowledge him their judge with feare and trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expounded the same prophecy in another place. All (faith he) shall be brought before the judgement seate of Christ. For it is written. So truly as I live, every knee shall bow to me, &c. But we may not so expound that which is in the Revelation: I have heard all creatures, both these things that are in heauen, and those that are upon the earth, and these that are under the earth, and those that are in the sea, and all those that are in them. I have heard them all say to hym that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power for ever & ever.

That I do in deed easily grant, but what creatures do they thinke to be here rehearsed? For it is most certain, that there are contained creatures both without reason, & without sense. Whereby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the parts of the worlde, from the highest top of the heauens to the very middle point of the earth, do in their manner declare the glory of their creator. As for that which they allege out of the history of the Machabees, I will not vouchsafe to answere it, least I should seeme to reckon that worke in the number of the holy bookes. But Augustine received it for Canonicall. But first, of what sure credit did he receiue it? The Jews (faith he) esteem not the writing of the Machabees as they do the Law, the Prophets, and the Pfalmes, of which the Lord himselfe hath witnesed as of his witnesses, saying: It was necessary that all things should be fulfilled that were written in the Law, & the Pfalmes, and Prophets concerning me. But it hath beene receiued of the Church not unprofitable, if it be soberly read or heard. And Hierome teacheth without any doubting that the authority thereof is of no force to prooving of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that old booke, which is entitled under the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creed, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I heere fitte without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he crafteth pardon, if he have spoken any thing not well. Truely he that confection his writings to neede pardon, faith plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost. Beside that, the godlines of Indus is praised for none other cause, but for that hee had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doth the writer of that historie referre that which Indus did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternal life, with the other faithfull, that had died for their country and religion. This doing was in deed not without superition and preposterous zede, but they are more than foole, that draw a sacrifice of the lawe so far as unto vs: forasmuch as we knowe that things do cease by the coming of Christ, that them were in vfe.

But they have an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which cannot so easily be battred. If any man (faith he) build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, heyestubble, the Lord shall shewe every mans work; what it is: because it shall be revealed in fire, and the fire shall trie every mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it shall suffer losse, but he shall be safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of purgatorio? by which the filthyines of sinne are clened away, that we may enter pure into the kingdom of God? But the most part of the olde writers thought it to bee another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the crose, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filthyines of the flesh; and that is much more probable, than in faining purgatorio. Albeit I doe neither agree with these men, because I thinke I have attained a certaine and much plainer understanding of that place. But before that I utter it, I would have them answere me, whether the Apostles and all the Saints must have gone through this fire of Purgatory? I know they will say, nay. For it were too much inconvenient.

that they must have needed to be purged, whose merits they dreamed to overflower above measure to all the members of the Church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say that the works of some shall be proved, but the works of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustine, which so confuteth that exposition. And (which is more absurd) he doth not say, that they shall pass through the fire for all works: but if they have faithfully built the Church, they shall receive reward when their works in examined with fire. Fuft, we see that the Apostle vied a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines invented by man's brains, wood, hay, and stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparent refuge: that as wood so stone as it is put in the fire, containeth and wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to follow the true cause of his Metaphore, and match the partes together with just relation, he called the trial of the holy Ghost, fire. For even as the nearer that gold and silver are put to the fire, so much the finerproved they have of their goodnes and fineness: so the Lords truths, the more exactly it is wed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credite it receiveth. As hay, wood, and stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudden consuming, so the inventions of men, not established by the word of God, cannot bear the trial of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fall away and perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hay, and stubble, because like wood, hay, and stubble, they are burned with fire & destroyed; but they are not destroyed or drawn away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth that the holy Ghost is the fire wherewith they shall be proved, whose proofs Paul, according to the common view of the scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called, the day of the Lord, when every he doth any way shew his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his truth shineth upon vs. Now he have were proved, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the trial of the holy Ghost. But how are they sauced by the fire, that suffer losse of their works? That shall not be hard to understand, if we consider of what kinde of men he speaketh. For he toucheth those builders of the Church, that keeping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter upon it, that is to say, they that not swearing from the chief and necessary articles of faith, do err in points that be smaller and less perillous, mingling their own deuises with the word of God, such I say, must suffer losse of their work, having their deuises destroyed. But themselves are sauced, but as by the fire, that is to say, not that their ignorance and error is allowable before the Lorde, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore, whosoever have defiled the golden fineness of God's words with this dung of purgatorie, they must needs suffer losse of their works.

10 But they will say, it hath beene an ancient usage of the Church. Paul answered this objection when he comprehended his owne time in that sentence, where he saith, that all they must suffer losse of their work; that in the building of the church, do lay any thing upon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therefore when the aduersaries objected against me, that it hath beene vied above a thousand and three hundred yeeres, to have prayers made for the dead: I ask them againe, by what word of God, by what revelation, by what example it was done. For here do they not only want testimonies of Scripture but also all the examples of holy men that there are read, do they not such thing. Of the mourning and order of funerals there are somtimes found many and long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to have beene expressly spoken. But the very old fathers themselves that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, and lawfull example. Why then durst they do so? In this I say, they did suffer somewhat as men, and therefore I affirm, that that which they did, ought not to be drawn into example. For whereas the faithful ought ought to enterprize the doing of nothing, but upon assured confidence, as Paul teacheth: this assuredness is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason into it: they sought some comfort to relieve their sorrow: and it seemed unnatural not to shew before God some testimony of their love toward the dead. How man's wit is inclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also the received custom was like a burning brand to set many men's minds on fire. We know that with all nations and in all ages there were funerals done for the dead, and their souls were yearly purged. For though Satan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he took occasion so to beguile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that even very superstition condemneth the Gentiles before the judgment seat of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselves to believe. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were utterly destroyed. Hereupon came that indulgent diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproach. And that which first proceeded from a wrongfull following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the principal holiness of Papistry, to help the dead in distress. But the Scripture ministreth another much better and perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lord. And it addeth a reason: because from thenceforth they rest from their labors. And we ought not so much tenderly to follow our own affection of love, to set up a wrongfull manner of praying in the Church. Truly he that hath but meane wisdom, doute soone perceive that all that is read hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vflage, and the ignorance of the people. They themselves also, I grant, were carried away into error even as unadvised lightnes of belief is wont to rob mens wits of judgement. But in the meantime the verie reading of the doth shew, how doubtingly they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that she might be remembered in celebrating the ministers at the Altar. An old viues request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would have it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doubtings, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heathe of a foolish zeal: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truely with cold likelihoodes it will bring them out of care that were before carefull. For this is one pillar of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growen in vfe, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, that it is a charitable vfe to help the dead: yet we must still hold one rule which cannot deceive: that it is not lawfull for vs in our prayers to vse any thing of our owne; but our requests must be made subject to the word of God: because it is in his will to appoint what he will have to be asked. Now where as the whole law and the Gospel do not so much as in one syllable give libertie to pray for the dead, it is a prophanne abuse of the innocution of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our adversaries may not boast that they have the ancient church companion of their error: I say there is great difference betweene them and it. They vfed a memorial of the dead, leaft they should seeme to have cast away all care of them: but they did therewith confesse that they doubted of their state. As for purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing uncertaine. These men require to have that which they have dreamed of purgatorie, to be holde without question for an article of faith. They flenderly and oneely to passe it lightly over, did in the communion of the holy supper commend their dead to God: Thence do continually call upon the care of the dead, and

and with importunate praising it, doe make it to be preferred above all dutifull works of charitie. Yea, and it were not hard for vs to bring fouerth some testimonies of the old writers, that do manifetly overthow all those prayers for the dead, which then were vfed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men looke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glory, and that every man then receive the rest that followeth after death, if he be woorthie when he dieth. And therefore he teffteth, that all the godly doe immediately after death enjoy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you shal our prayers avail them? I passe over the grofser superstitions, wherewith they have bewitched the minds of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can have no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthy buyings and sellings that they have vfed, while the world was in much grosse senseleffe ignorance. For both I should never make an end, and also the readers shall without any rehearfall of them, haue here sufficient, whereupon they may flabilit their conscienties.

The vj. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian mans: And first, by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.

We haue alreadie said, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth is that in the life of the faithfull there should appeare an agreement and consent betweene the righteouffe of God and their obedience: and that to they should con-tsine the adoption, whereby they are receuied to be children. But although his lawe containe in it selfe that newneffe, whereby the image of God is restored in vs, yet because our durne hath neede both of many prickings forwarde and helps,there-fore it shall be profitable to gather out of divers places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that have a desirous mind of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endeavir. Now when I take upon me the framing of a Christians mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifolde and plentious argument, and such as may with the greatneffe thereof fill a long volum; if I would absolutely entreate of it in all pointes. For we see into what great length are strecth the exhortatori orations of old writers, made onely every one of one feueral vertue,

And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For whatsoever vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plente of matter, that a man cannot seeme to have discoursed well of it, unless he haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teach, as peculiarly to go through euery speciall vertue, and wander abroad into exhortations. Let such things be fetched out of other mens writings, and special-ly out of the Homilies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shew an orderly trade, whereby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine vnuerfall rule, by which he may well trie what be his duties. There shall peraduenture at some other season be a fit time to make declarations, or I will leave that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe. I doe naturally loue shortnesse, and peraduenture if I would speake more at large; it would not frame well with me. And if a longer maner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue mind to put it in proofe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Philosophers haue their certaine ends of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the company of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most godly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Philosophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vain-glorying men) have diligently endeavored to attain an exquisite plainness of order, to show forth the ready aptness of their wit. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime voucheth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof of we now speake, standeth chiefly upon two parts. The first, that there be powerd and brought into our minde a love of righteousness, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing enjoined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousness. In commendation of righteousness it hath both very many and very good reasons: of which we have here before in divers places spoken of some, and other some, wherein we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better begin than when it putteth vs in mind that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sheep, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth vs together againe, to joyn vs in one flocke he calls us. When we hear mention made of our joyning with God, let vs remember that holyneff must be the bond thereof. Not that by the meaning of holyneffe we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleave vnto him, that being endued with his holyneffe, we may follow whither he calleth) but because it greatly pertaineth to his glory, that he have no fellowship with wickedneffe and uncleanneffe. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought alway to have respect vnto, if we will answer God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawn out of the wickedneffe and filthineffe of the world, if we give our selves leave all our life long to wallow in them still? Moreover it also admonisheth vs that to the end we may be reckned among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy city Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himselfe, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholyly prophaned by the uncleanneffe of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that Psal. 139. 9. they shall have a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and study to follow righteousness, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuary whereon he dwelleth, should be like a stable full of filthineffe.

3 And the better to awake us it sheweth that God the father, as he hath joyned vs to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would have vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophie concerning manners, is in them only orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhorte vs to virtue, bring nothing els but that we should live agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true wellspring, when it not only teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whom it is bond: but also when the hath taught that we arewaue out of kinde from the true original and state of our creation, the immediately adds, that Christ by whom we came againe into favour with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should express the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectual than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this one thing? For if the Lord hath by adoption made us children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bond of our adoption; if we do not give and shew our selves to righteousnes, we doe not only with most wicked: breach of allegiance depart from our creator, but also we falslye him to be our Saviour. Then the Scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefits of God, which he rehearseth vnto vs, and all the parts of our salvation. And sheweth that if God hath shewed himselfe a father vnto vs, we are worthy to be condemned of extreme unthankfulness, if we do not Likewise in our behalfe shew our selves children vnto him. blood, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptism, it is not seemly that we should be spotted with new filthiness. Sith he hath graffed vs into his body, we must carefully take heed that we sprinkle not any spot or blot upon vs that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our head, is ascended into heaven, it behoeth vs that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our hart aspire to heavenward; Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must endeavour that Gods glory may be honourably set out by vs, and must not doe any thing whereby we may be profaned with filthiness of sinne. Sith both our soule and our body are ordained to heavenly incorruption and an uncorruptable crown, we must diligently travaile, that the same may be kept pure and uncorrupted vnto the day of the Lord. These (I say) be the best laide foundations to build a mans life, and such as the like are not to be founde among the Philosophers, which in commendation of vertue doe never climb above the naturall dignite of man.

4 And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet would be named Christians. But with what face doe they boast of his holy name: Sith none have any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue received a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Gospell? But the Apostle saith, that all they haue not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the olde man which is corrupted according to the desires of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is pronouced that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretend the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundly talk of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learnings be, with only understanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it poffefsth the whole soule, and findereth a seat and place to hold it in the most inward affection of the hart. Therefore either let them cease, to the flaunder of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shew themselues not vnworthy schollers for Christ their maister. We have given the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is contained, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must be pouer into our hart, and passe into our manners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philosophers doe soouily chafe against them, and doe with flamefull reproche drue them from their companie, that proffing an arte that ought to be Schoolmaisters of life, doe turne it into a Sophistical babling: with how much better reason shall we deteste these triffling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell vpon the top of their tongues, the effectuall working where of ought to pearce into the inmost affections of the hart, to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man an hundred times more, than the cold exhortation of Philosophers?

5 Yet doe I not require that the manners of a Christian man fauour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which nevertheless both were to be wished and we must indevoure vs toward it. But I doe not so souerely require a gospelllike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a Christian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the Church, Sith there is no man founde that is not by a great space distant from it, and many have hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet should be vniouly caste away. What then? let that be seet for the mark before our eies, to which alone all our endeouer may be directed. Let that be appointed the goal for vs to run and travaile vnto. For it is not lawful for thee to make partition with God, to take upon thee part of these things that are commanded thee in his word, and to leave part at thine owne choice. For first of all heuerie where commendeth integrity as the cheefe part of worshipping him: by which word he meaneth a pure simplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faining: against which a double hart is set as contrary: as if it should be said, that the beginning of liuing vpwhite is spirituall, when the inward affection of the minde mind is without faining dedicate to God to obserue holiness and righteousness.

But because no man in this earthly prison of the bodie hath soe great strength to haft with such freenes of running, as he perfectely ought to do, and the greater number are so feeble, that with staggering and halting, yea and creeping upon the ground, they avance but slowly forward. Let vs exercie one goe according to the measure of his little power, and proceede on our journey begun. No man shall goe soe vntowardly, but he shall every day get some ground, though it be but little. Therefore let vs not cease to travell soe, that we may continually proceede somewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not despaine vpon the slendernes of our going forward, for howsoever the sucesse of our actions are not our desire, yet we have no lost our labour when this day pafteth yesterday soe: that with pure limplicity we looke vnto our marke, and long toward the end of our course, not loothingly flattering our selves, nor tenderly bearing with our owne eules, but with continuall endeavoure trauelling to this, that we may still become better than our selves, till we attaine to goodnes it selfe: which in deed we seeke for and follow all our life long: but we shall then only attaine it, when being unclerked of the weakenes of the flesh, we shall be received into the full fellowship thereof.

The viij. Chapter.

The summe of a Christian life: wherein is intreated of the forlaking of our selves.

Albeit that the law of the Lord have a most aptly wel disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it seemed good to the heavenly schoolemaister to instruct men yet with a more exacte trade to the same rule that he had sett forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade is this: that it is the duty of the faithfull to yeeld their bodies to God a living, holy and acceptable sacrifice vnto him: and that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Hereupon is gathered occasion to exhorte men, that they do not apply themselves to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may prove what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we should from thence forth thinke, speake, imagine, or do nothing but to his glory. For the thing that is consecrate, cannot be applied to unholy vses, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appear eth what errour is to be avoided, and wherunto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will bee rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the end for vs to tend vnto, to seeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selves, and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs live and die to him. We are Gods: therefore let vs his wisdome and will goevere all our doings. We are Gods: therefore let all the parts of our life tend toward him as their only lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that having learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from himselfe the rule and government of himselfe to give it to God? For as this is the most strong working persuance to destroy men, that they obey themselves: Rom.14.8. so it is the onely hauen of liars, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but only to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first step, that man depart from himselfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying 1 call not only that which standeth in obedience of the word, but that whereby the mind of man, void from his owne sensualitie of flesh, bendeth it Ephes.4:23. selfe wholly to the will of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) whereas it is the first entrée into life, all the Philosophers were ignorant.
Cap. 7. Of the manner how to receive ignorant. For they make onely Reafon the gouernesse of man; they thynke the one-ly ought to be heard : finally to her onely they gve and affigne the rule of manners, but the Christian Philosophie biddeth her to gue place, and to yeeld and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man now may not lue himselfe, but bære Christ huing and reigning in him.

The next degree of rigneousnes to seeke those things that are of God sincerely for them feales not in anie side respect of our owne.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that we seeke not the things that be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lorde, and that make to the aduancement of his glory. This is also a prooe of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our fulues, and altogether leaving the regard of our fulues, we trauell to employ our studie to God and his commandements. For when the Scripture biddeth vs to leave privie regard of our fulues, it doth not onelie race out of our mindes the countoulines of hauing the greede secking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glory, and other more secret petitions. Truely a Christian man must be so fathioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this fort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and judgement: so he shall reverently direct vs to all the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke vpon God in all things that he hath to doe, is therewithall turned away from all vaine thoughts. This is that forsaking of our fulues, which Christ euken from their first be-inning of instruction to earnestly gauie in charge to his discipules: when it oncethath bitten pooffion in the hart leaueth no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulnes, nor vain glorious boasting, then neither for cautife, nor filthie lust, nor riottousnes, nor unregard, nor for other evils that are engendered of the lone of our fulues. Contrariwise, where ouer it reigneth not, there either most filthy vices do rage without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glory. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he haue forsaken himselfe according to the commandement of the Lorde, will of his owne free will vse goodnes among men. For all they that have not been pooffed with this feeling, if they have followed vertue, they have done it at the least for praises fake. And all the Philosophers that ever most of all affirmed that vertue was to be defined for it selfes fake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appereed that they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proud vpon. But God is so nothing at all delighted, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with those swel-lung beaftes, that he pronounceth that they have alreadie receiued their rewarde in the worlde, and maketh harlots and Publicanes nearer to the kingdom of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not thoroughly declared with how many and how great flaues man is hindered from that which is right, so long as he hath not forsaken himselfe. For it was truly laid in times past, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the foule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies but denying thy selfe, and leauing regard of thy selfe, to bend thy minde to seeke those things that the Lorde requireth of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

3 In another place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, goe through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth saluation vnto all men, hath apperead and teacheth vs, that we shoule denie all vngod-lineffe, and worldly lustes, and that we shoule live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for the bleffed hope and glorious appeaung of the mightie God, and of our Saviour Iefus Christ, which gave himselfe for vs to re-deeme us from all vngodlieufnes, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himliue frequently giuen vnto good works. For after that he hath fet forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make ready the way for vs to worship God, he taketh awaie two stoppes that doe moft hinder vs, that is to say, vngodlineffe, whereunto wee are naturally too much inclined, and Worldly desires, which extende further. And under under the name of godliness, he not only meaneth superstitious, but also comprehendeth all that diagreeeth with the earnest fear of God. And worldly lustes are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore he commandeth vs in respect of both the tables of the lawe, to put of our owne wit, and to forfakke all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life he bringeth into three parts, sobriety, righteounesse, and godliness: of which sobriety without doubt signifieth as well chaste and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing of temporal things, and a patient sufferrance of pouertie. Righteounesse containeth all the duties of equitie, to gue every man his owne. The third is Godliness, that seuereth vs from the defilings of the world, and with true holinesse joyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnseparable knott, make a full perfection. But for as much as nothing is more hard, than forfaking the reafon of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to give our selues to God and our brethren, and to studie for an Angelike life in the filthie rate of the earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth us backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to strue in vaine: because as Christ hath once appeared the redeemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the fruit of the saluation that he hath purchased. And thus he dureth away the entiements that blinde vs, and make vs not to aspire as we ought, to the heavenly glorie; yea and he teacheth that we must travell as men being from home in this world, that the heavenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

Now in these words we perceiue, that the forfaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For whereas the Scripture biddeth vs to behaue our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that we faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commoditie: therefore it giveth such commandements as our minde is not able to receive, but first being made void of natural sense. For (with such blindnesse wee runne all into love of our selues) every man thinketh himselfe to have a just cause to advance himselfe, and to despise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God have giuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely swel, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good gifts, which we praiie in our selues, or better doe appeare in other, least we should be compelled to give place to them, we doe with our enviousnesse deface them and finde fault with them. If there be any faults in them, we are not contented stouterly and sharplie to mark it, but we also odiously amplifie it. Hereupon growth that insolencie, that every one of vs, as though he were pruifiled from the common estate, would be higher than the rest, and carelesslie and proudlie sit light by every man, or despise them as inferiour. The poore yeeld to the rich, hafe people to gentlemen, servants to their masters, unlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So every man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdom in his brest. For presumptuounely taking vpou them somewhat whereby to please themselvese, they judge vpou the wits and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there busseth out their poiyon. For many doe make a sheue of great meeknesse, so long as they finde all things gentle and lovely; but how many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is picked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedie herof, but that the most hartfull pestilence of loue, of soueraigne and selfe loue be rooted out of the bottome of their hartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that we must remember that the good gifts that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good things, but the free gifts of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their Cap. 7. Of the maner how to receive their owne vnthankfulnesse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul faith, if thou hast received all things, why doest thou boast, as if they were not given thee? Then, that we must with continual reknowledging of our faultes, call our selues backe to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vnpon, but there shall be much matter to abase our selues. Againe, we are commanded, whatsoeuer giftes of God we see in other men, so to reuerence and esteeme those giftes, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it were a great Lewndenesse for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchsafed to giue them. As for their faultes, we are taught to winke at them, not to cherishe them with flattering, but that we should not by reason of those faultes triumph against them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man soever we haue to doe, we shall behave our selues not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendely. As a man shall never come any other way to true meekenesse, but if he have a heart endued with abasing of himselfe, and reuerencing of other.

5. Now how hard is it, for thee to doe thy dutie in seeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, vnlesse thou depart from regard of thy selfe, and in a maner put off thy selfe. For how canst thou performe these things that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charity, vnlesse thou forfayke thy selfe, to gie thy selfe wholly to other? Charity (faith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not disdainfull, envie not, vnlesse he not, seeketh not her owne, is not angrie, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seeke not the things that are our owne, we shall doe no small violence to nature, which so bendeth vs to the onely loue of our selues, that it doth not easily suffer vs negligently to passe over our selues and our owne things, to watch for other mens commoditie, yea to depart with our owne right to refigne it to another. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hand, warneth vs that whatsoever gracious giftes wee obtaine of the Lorde, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they should be bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true use of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountiefull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuided for the keeping of the same, than when we be taught that all the good giftes that we haue, are things of God deliered, committed to our truitt vpon this condition, that they should be disposed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it comparreth them to the powers where-with the members of mans body are endued. No member hath his power for himselfe, nor applieth it to his owne private use: but poureth it abroade into the other members of the same bodie, and taketh no profit therto, but such as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatsoever a godly man is able to doe, he ought to be able to doe it for his brethren, in prouding none othertwffe priviately for himselfe, but so that his mind be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoever God hath bestowed vpon vs, whereby we may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailifes thereof, and bound to render account of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So shall it come to passe, that we shall alway not onely joyne the travell for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that we should not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the giftes that we receive of God, he hath in the old time set the same lawe even in the smalles giftes of his liberaltie. For he commanded the first fruits of the currant to be offered vnto him, by which the people might testifie that it was unlawfull for them to take any fruit of the goodes that were not first consecrate to him. If the giftes of God be so onely then sanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our owne hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is evident that it is an vntrue abuse thereof that doth not favou

of such dedication. But it shall bee vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lorde with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore such thy liberalitie cannot extend vnto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must vs it towarde his Saints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy obligations, that they may now be correspondent to these of the law.

6 But that we should not be wearie with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adiowned which the Apostle speakeh of; that charitie is patient & not moved to anger. The Lord commandeth to do good to all vniversally, of whom a great part are most vnworthie, if they be considered by their owne deserving. But heere the Scripture helpeth with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we must not have respect what men desyre of themselues, but that the image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honor and loue. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the houshold of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed and restored by the spirite of Chrift. Therefore whatsoever man thou light vpon, that needeth thy helpe, thou haft no cause to withdraw thy selfe from doing him good. If thou say that he is a stranger: but the Lorde hath given him a marke, that ought to be familiar vnto thee, by the reason that hee forbidde thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that he is base and naughtie: but the Lorde sheweth him to be such a one, to whom he hath vouchsafed to give the beauty of his image. If thou say that thou owste him nothing for anie thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whom, thou knowest so many & so great benefits wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou saye that hee is vnworthie that thou shouldest labour any thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended vnto thee, is worthy that thou shouldest giue thy selfe and all that thou haft vnto it. But if hee haue not onely deferred no good at thy hande, but also provoked thee with wronges and cull doings: even this is no just cause why thou shouldest ceaze both to loue him & to do for him the dutifull worke of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise deferred of me. But what hath the Lorde deferred? Which when hee commandeth thee to forgive al wherein he hath offended thee, truly he willeth the same to be imputed to himselfe. Truly this is that only way to com to that which is vertelie against the nature of man, much more is it hard for man, I meane, to love them that hate vs, to recompence cull with doing good, to rendr blessings for reproches: if we remember that we must not consider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faultes, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to embrace it.

7 Therefore this Mortification shal then onely take place in vs, when wee performe the duties of charitie. But it is not hee that performeth them, that onely doth all the dutifull worke of charitie, although he leave none of them undone, but he doth them of a syncre affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to all men all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outwarde duties: and yet he may be farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that wouldt seeme verie liberal, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnes of wordes they upbraid it. And we be come to such wretchednesse in this vnhappy world, that almost no almes are giuen of any men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproching. Which penitfenesse shoulde not haue beene tolerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required then to shew a cheerefulnesse in courtenance, and make their doings lonely with gentlenes of words. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whom they see to neede their helpe, and then to pitie their cafe, as if themselfes did feel and suffer it: so that they may be carried with feeling of mercie and gentlenes, even as they woulde be to helpe themselfes. He that shall come so minded to helpe

To doe the worke of Charitie is no thing, except they be done charitably.
Cap. 7. Of the maner how to receive his brethren, will not onely not defile his doings with any arrogancy or upbraiding, but alio neither will despit his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his help, nor treate him vnderfoot as one bound vnto him: no more then we vvere to reproach a sick member, for eating whereof the whole bodie laboureth, or to think it specially bound to the other members, because it hath drawn more helpe vnto it than it hath recompened. For it is thought that the common interparting of duties between members of one bodie, hath no free kind of gift, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the law of nature it were monstrous to denie. And by this reason it shall follow, that he may not think himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of dutie, as it is commonly vied, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, he leaueth other charges to others, as not belonging to him. But rather every man shall think thus with himselfe, that he is altogether debtor to his neighbours, and that he must determine none other end of vng his liberalitty, but when able to sayleth, which how large soever it be, must be measured by the rule of charitat, vol. 3.

Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall part of forsaking our selves, which wee faile to have respect to God. We have made much of it at alreadie, which it was superfuous to rehearse againe: it shall be sufficient to entreat of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietenesse of minde and sufferance. First therefore in secking the commodite or quietenesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lords will, we would yeeld vnto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To couet wealth and honors, to compass authority, to heap vp riches, to gather together all such sollicites as serve for royalitie and pompe, our hunte is outrageous, and our greediness infinite. On the other side of povertie, ignobilitty, and base estate, we have a maruellous fear and maruellous hatred, that moove vs to trauell by all means to eschew them. Hereby a man may see, how vanquet a minde they have, how many fiastes they attempt, vs what studeys they wearie their life, that frame their life after their owne deuide: to attain those things that their affection of ambition or courtousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape poverty and basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not enangled with such snare. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or think vpon any other meanes of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them freely and boldly refle themselues vpon it. For howsoeuer the flesh think it felte sufficient of her selues, when the other trauelleth by her owne diligence, or eneourageth with her owne studie, as is holpen by the favour of men, to the attainyng of honour and wealth: yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, and that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauell but so much as the Lord hal prosper both. But on the other side his onely blessing findeth a way through all stops, to make all things proceeds vs to a topfull and luckie end. Then howsoever we may most of all obtaine any glorie or wealth without it (as we dayly fee the witch to get heapes of great honors & riches) yet forasmuch as they upon whom resteth the curie, doe feele no parcel of felicitie, wee can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to evil. And it is not at all to be courted, that maketh men more miserable.

He which knoweth himselfe and his owne depend wholy vpon the blessing of God will neither seeke to advance himselfe by ryll meanes, nor immoderately desire to be advanced, nor impatiently murmer at any thing which happeneth.
the grace of Christ.  Lib.3.  .186 craftie meanes, or extortion with doing: injurie to our neighbours, but shall one follow those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other little meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing folleweth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doth righte, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt dooings. Then we shall be bridled that we burne not with unnecessary desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honors. For with what face may a man strive to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that he de-sireth against his word? For God forbid that God should give the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not ac-\nting to our wish & hope; yet we shall be restrained fro impatience, and fro cutting our estate whatsoever it be; because we know that that is to murmur against God, at \n whose will riches and poverty, baze ande ande honors are disposed. Briefly, he that \n refleth himselfe in such fort as is aforefaid vpon the blessing of God, neither will by \n euill sitteitas hunt for those things that men are wont outragiously to court, by \n which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing \n happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, ende\n nuous or to fortune, but will alligne it to God the Author. But if while other mens estates doe flourishe, he goe but slenderlie forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will \n bear his ill fortune with greater quietnesse and moderation of minde, than a pro\n phane man will beare a meanely good successse, which is not altogether so good as \n he defined: because he hath a comfort wherin he may more quietly rest, than vpon \n the highest top of wealth and authoritie: because he accounteth that his things are \n ordered by God as is available for his salvation. So we see that David was minded, \n and yeeldeth himselfe to be ruled by God, he declareth himselfe to be like to a weaned child, and that he walketh not in hugh things or manfullous aboue himselfe.

16 And the godly minde ought to haue that quietnesse and suffrance not only consisting in this behalfe: but also must extend to all chunces whereunto our present life is subject. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath so resigned himself vp wholly to the Lord, that he suffereth all the partes of his life to be governed by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoever happen, will neither think himselfe miserable, nor will with censure ande against God complain of his fortune. How necessarie this affections is, shall hereby appeare, if you con-der to how many chunces we be subject. Diverse kindes of diseases doe trouble vs, sometyme the peaticence cruelly reigneth, sometyme we are sharply vexed with calamitites of warre, sometime frost or hale detaining the hope of the yeare, bringeth barrenesse, that drueth vs to death: sometime our wife, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these be the things at frustrating whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, hate Heauen and Light in excreation, murmur against God, and (as they be eloquent in blaspheme-\ics) accuse him of vnjustice and crueltie: But a faithful man must even in these chances behold the mercifull kindnesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore ceaze to praife God, but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leave it desolate. Or if when his corn is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten downe with hale, he see famine at hand, yet he will not despair, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, We are yet in the Lords protection, and heep brought vp in his pastures: Psa.79.13. he therefor will finde vs fooded euie in extremest barrenesse. Or if he be troubled with sickenesse, euie then he will not bee discouraged with bitterness of forrowe, to burst out into impatience and quarter thus with God: but confide-ning the righteoufnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he will call himselfe backe to Bb 2  patience.

Cap. 8. Of the manner how to receive patience. Finally whatsoever shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, he will take it with a well pleased and thankful minde, lest he should stubbornly resist his authoritative, in whose power he hath yielded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their minds against adversities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because she was blind and vnadvised, that blindly wounded both the deferving and vndeferving. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlines, that the only hand of God is the judge and gouernesse of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forward with vnadvised sudden rage, but with most orderly justice dealeth among vs both good things and euell.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the bearing of the crosse, which is a part of the forsa king of our felues.

He which forsa-keth himselfe must arm himselfe to endure a trauel-some estate of life, whereas there is none the less limiting this comfort we go no other way than Christ himselfe hath troden before us. Mar. 16.24. Mat. 3.17. & 17.5. Rom. 8.2. A&. 14.11. Phil. 3.10.

Affliction necess-arie for us not onely as for Christ to reftifie our obedi-ence unto God, but further also to bring us to a sen-sible feeling of our owne infubmis-ion and weakeenesse.

Becaused a godly minde must yet climbe vp higher, even to that whereunto Christ called his disciples, that every one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lord hath chosen & vouchsafed to receive into one company, must prepare themselfes to a hard, trouesome and vnquiet life, and full of many and divers kinds of incoommodities. So it is the will of the heavenly father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may have a true proofe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloved sonne above the rest, and in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and dammely handeled: so that it may be truly said, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kind of continuall crosse. The Apostle therefore the crosse thereof to be, that he behoulded that he should learn obedience by those things that he suffered. Why then should we priviledge our selves from that estate, whereunto it behould Christ our head to be subject, specially fish he became subject therunto for our sake, to shew vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle faith that this is the appointed ende of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard and sharp chancese, which are reckoned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the sufferings of Christ: that as he endured out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we may by divers tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so faith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we do also conceiue the power of his resurrection: and when we are fannahed like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowship of his glorious rising againe. How much may this example to affwage all the painfullnes of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our fellowship with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferings are not onely made blessed vnto vs, but also do much helpe vs to the furtherance of our saluation.

2. Beside that, our Lord had no neede to take upon him to beare the crosse, but to restifie and procure his obedience to his father: but we for divers causes have need to lead our life vnder a continuall crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to atributive all things to our felue) vnlesse our weakenes bee shewed vs as it were before our eies, we do easily esteem our owne strength above due measure, and doubt not that whatsoever happen, it will continue unbrokene and vnovercume against all hard aflaultes. Whereby we are carried into a foolish and vaine confidence of felie, and then trusting therupon, we stubbornly waxe proud against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate. beate downe, than when he prooueth vnto you by experience, not onely how feeble, but also how fraille we be. Therefore he afflicteth you either with shame, or povertie, or losse of children, or sicknesses, or other calamities, which we being vnable to bære in respect of our felues, doe by and by fake downe vnder them. Being so humbled we learne to call vpon his stregthe, which onely maketh you to stand vp right vnder the heauie burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well souer you know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much aflured of their owne strength and confancie, vnlesse by the triall of the croffe, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselves. The flothfulness crept into David: I said in my repit, I shall never be moued, Lord, thou hast established in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was striken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnes in prosperitie his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, vpon which he should have hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to prooue himselfe perpetuall continuance. If this chaunce to do great a Prophet: which of vs ought not to be searefull, that we may be heedefull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselves with opinion of a greater constancie and patience, when they are once humbled with adversitie, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisse. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, doe thereby prooue to humilite, that being vnclad of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may reftort to the grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience proofe. For whereas God hath promis'd the faithfull that he will be present with them in troubles, they feele the fame to be true, when they stand patiently being vpholder by his hand, which by their owne stregthe they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a proofe by experience to the holy ones, that God when need requireth, will indeed performe the helpe that he hath promis'd. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the fame truth of God that they had already by experience prooued to be constant and sure. We see now how many good things doe come vnto you in one knot by the croffe. For outherthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume of our owne strength, and discloefing our hypocrisse that delighteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God onely, by which it commeth to passe, that we neither be oppressed nor fall downe. And after victorie followeth hope, incometh as the Lord in performing that which he hath promis'd, establisheth the credite of his truth for time to come. Truely, although there were noe reaons but these, it appeareth how much the exercize of the croffe is necessarie for vs. For it is a matter of no small importance, to hauue the blinde loue of thy felfe wiped away, that thou maist well know thine owne weaknesses. To feele thine owne weaknesses, that thou maist learne to disftrust thy felfe: to disftrust thy felfe, that thou maist remove thy confidence from thy felfe vnto God, to rest with confidence of hert vpon God, that being vpholder by his helpe, thou maist continue vnto vndercome to the last end: to stand fast by his grace, that thou maist understand that he is true in his promis'es: to know by proofe the truth of his promis'es, that thy hope may be strengthened thereby.

4 The Lord hath also an other end of affliction his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vsee any obedience toward him, other than the fame that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approoued by wuncesse, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not be idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing foorth into open the strength of sufferrance and confancie, wherewith he hath furnished his servants, it is said that he trieth their patience. And from hence came the se fayings: that God tempted Abraham, and had procured of his godliness, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his own and only sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth that our faith is so proved in troubles, as gold is tried in a furnace. And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithful man hath received of his God, should be brought forth into vfe, that it may be made certainly known and manifest? For otherwise men will not esteem it as it is worthie. Now if God himself doth righteously when he ministrith matter to stir vp the virtues that he hath given to his faithful, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie unprofitable and perishing: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their patience should be nothing. I say also that by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to live not after their owne will, but after the will of God. Truly if all things should flow into them after their owne will, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an old Proverbe, when they exhorted any man to suffer adversitie, to follow God. By which they declared, that then only a man truly entered under the yoke of God, when he yielded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Now if it be most righteous, that we should shew our selves in all things obedient to the heavenly father, then we ought not to refuse, that he should by all means accustome vs to yield obedience vnto him.

5 But yet we perceive not how necessary this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we do also consider, how wanton our flesh is to take off the yoke of God, so loone as it hath beene but a little while daintily and tenderly handecl. The same happeneth vnto it, that chaunceth to stubborn horsefes, which if they be a fewe days pampered idly, they cannot afterward for the same disposal be tamed, neither doe know the rider, to whose government they somewhat before obedient. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to have beene in the people of Israel, that being well fed and couered with fatenesse, we kicke against him that fed and nourishes vs. The liberalitie of God should indeed have allureth vs to consider and love his goodnes, but for as much as our evil nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender vnage, it is more than necessary for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we run not ouragiously into such a stubborn wantonnesse. So that we should not growe fierce with vnmeasurable abundance of riches, that we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that we should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune, the Lord himselfe, as he forseeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it, and with the remedie of the crosse suffiueth and bridleth the fiercenes of our flesh, and that divers waises, so much as is healthfull for euery man. For all are not alike sicke of all one disease, or do alike need of hard healing. And thereupon is to be feene how some are exercised with one kind of crosse, and some with another. But whereas the heavenly Phisitton handeleth some more genly, and purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to provide for the health of all: yet he leaueth none free or vn touched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

6 Moreover, the most mercifull father needeth not onely to prevent our weaknes, but many times to correct our past offences. Therefore so oft as we are afflicted, the remembrance of our forepast life ought by and by to enter into our mind: so without doubt we shall finde that we have done somewhat worthy of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience upon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministrith vs a farre better consideration, when it faith, that the Lord correcteth vs with adversitie, that we should not bee damned with this world. Therefore we ought even in the very sharpest of tribulations to acknowledge the kindnes & goodness of our father toward vs, so as much as we then he ceafeth not to further our salvation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliver vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shall lead vs to that, which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be weary when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, and embrace him as a father doth his child. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duty rather to shew ourselves obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardened with cruel doings? The Lord leefeth vs, vnlesse he call vs backe by correction when we are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews rightly faith that we are bastards, and not children if we be out of correction. Therefore we are most froward, if we cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that he hath for our salvation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene the vnbelievers and the faithful, that the vnbelievers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardened wickednes, are made the woore and more obfinate with whipping: the faithful, like children having an honest freedome of nature, do thereby profit to repentance. Nowe must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I have spoken of this matter in another place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an end.

7 Moreover it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persectution for righteousnesses. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchfaith to grant vs, that he so garnisheth vs with the peculiar mark of his souldiers. I mean that they suffer persecution for righteousness, not onely that suffer for defense of the Gospell, but also that are troubled for any defence of righteousness. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God against the lies of Satan, or in taking in hand the defense of good men and innocents against the wrongs of the wicked, we be driven to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the world, whereby our life or goods, or estimacion may come in danger: let it not be greevous or loathsome vnto vs to employ our felues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in these things in which hee hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Poueticke indeed, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishment, contemptuous eftate, imprisonement, shame: Finally, death is the uttermost of all calamities. But when the favor of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicitie. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimonie of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall rejoice as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues cleere in our consciences, are by the naughtie dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are indeede brought to pouerie thereby among men, but so riches truly growe do vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be throut of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the household of God. If we be vexed and despised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If we be noted with reproches and shame, we are in so much the more honorable place in the kingdome of God. If we be slaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs be ashamed to esteeme lesse these things, vpon which the Lord hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with thefe and like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defense of righteousnesse, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly and cheerfully receive them at the Lords hand, specially Sith this is the kinde of crose, most proprely belonging to the faithful, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more greevous to gentle natures to suffer shame then a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not onely suffer persectutions, but also reproches because wee truft in the living God. As in another place hee teacheth vs after his example to walke through slaunder and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a chearsfulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitterness and sorrow, or else the patience of the holy ones in the crosse were no patience, unless they should be both tormentd with sorrow and vexed with grieve. If there were no hardnes in po-osity, no paine in sicknes, no grieve in shame, no horrour in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to bear them indifferently? But when every one of these doth with the natural bitterness thereof the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithfull man shew itselfe, if being afflicted with the feeling of such bitterness, how grievously heer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly refitting he overcommeth it, his patience wittereth itselfe herein, if being sharply provoked, he is yet so bridled with the fear of God, that he butteth not out into any distemper. His chearsfulness appeareth herein, if being wounded with sadnes and sorrow, he resteth upon the spirituall comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithfull do sustaine against the natural feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience and temperance, Paul hath very well descrited in these words, We are put to distresse in all things, but we are not made forowfull: we labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer perfection, but we are not forfaken in it: we are thrown downe, but we perish not. You see how to bear the crosse patiently, is not to be altogether astonisht, and without all feeling of sorrow: as the Stoikes in old time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such a one, as putting off all nature of man, was aske moued in prosperity and in adversity, in forowful and joyfull state, yea such a one as to be as a stone was moued with nothing: and what have they profited with this high wisedome? Forsooth they have painted out such an image of wisedome as never was found, and never can hereafter be among men: But rather while they coueten to have too exact and precise a patience, they have taken away all the use of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among Christians there are new Stoikes, that reckon it a fault not only to groane and wepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions do commonly proceed from idle men, which burying themselves rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but breede vs such new found doctrines. But we have nothing to do with that stony Philosophie, which our master and Lord hath condemned not only by his word but also by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens aduersities. The world (faith he) shall renioyce, but you shall mourn and wepe. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no manuill. For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we judge of the Lord himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody teares? If every feare be noted of insidicy, what shall we judge of that quaking feare, wherewith we read that he was not slenderly striken? If all sadnes be misliked, how shall we lkie this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad euon to the death?

10 This I thought good to speake to this end, to call godly minds from despair, that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not putt off the natural affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a fenestlese dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a flock. For the Scripture giuteth to the holy ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of adversities, that yet they be not overcome nor thrown downe with it; when they be so pricked with bitterness, that they be also delighted with spirituall joy: when they be so distresse with grieve, that yet they receive courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnance abideth stil in their hearts, that natural bittenece fheweth and dreaddeth those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godlynesse travaileth euon through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnance the Lord exprest when he said thus to Peter: When thou waft yong thou didst gud thy felse the grace of Christ. Lib. 3. p. 189 false and didst walke whither thou wouldest: But when thou art old, an other shall gird thee and leade thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time was that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn unwillingly and resifting vnto it. Else his martyrdom should haue but small praise. But howsoever he did with great cheerfulness of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloudy death that he should suffer, being striken with horror thereof, he would gladly have escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and treading downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerfully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must indueour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reverence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinance all contrary afflictions. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoever kind of crosse we be vexed, euene in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For adversities shall have their sharpnes, wherewith we shall be bitten: so when we are afflicted with sicknes, we shall both groane and be disquieted and desire health; so being pressed with povertie, we shall be pricked with the stinges of carefullnesse and sorrow: so shall we be striken with griefe of shame, contempt and injury: so shall we yeeld due tears to nature at the burial of our friends: but this alwaye shall be the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his will. Yea euene in the middest of the prickings of sorrow, in the middest of mourning and teares this thought must needs come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerfully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so mowed.

The difference between Christian and Philosophical patience.

11 But forasmuch as we have taken the chief cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in few words define what difference is betweene Philosophical and Christian patience. Truely very few of the Philosophers climbed to so high a reason, to understand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, and to thinke that God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeeld vnto God, because thou shalt travaile in vaine to wrestle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessity: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, just iustice and equitie, then the care of our saluation. Therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether povertie, or banishment, or imprisonement, or shame, or sicknesse, or losse of parents, or children, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these things doeth happen, but by the will and providence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most just order: For why? do not our innumerable and daily offences deserveth to be chastised more sharplie: and with more grieuous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God lateth vpon vs? Is it not most great equitie, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that she do not wantonly growe wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousness and truth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an undoubted righteousness in our afflictions, we cannot without virighteousnes either murmur or wrestle against it. We are not now that cold singe: We must give place, because we so must of necessity, but we haue a lively leeffon and full of effectualnes, We must obey, because it is veryfull to resift: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornnes against the righteousness of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthy to be soued off vs, which we know to be to our safety & benefit, the good father doth this way also comfort vs, when he affirmeth that euene in this that he afflicteth vs with the crosse, he provideth for our safety. But if it be certain that troubles
The ix. Chapter.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

But what soever kind of trouble we be distreased, we must alway looke to this ende, to vse our selues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well how much we be by nature inclined to the beastly loue of this world, he vther a most fit meane to drawe vs backe, and to shake off our fluggishnesse, that we should not sticke too long in that loue. There is none of vs that desireth not to vse the world, and endeavour all their life long to heavenly immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excelle brutte beastes in nothing: whose state should be nothing inferior to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doings of every man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon growth that senflesnesse, that our minde being daefeled with vaine glittering of riches, power and honors, is so dulled that it cannot see farre. Our hart also being possessioned with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weighed downe, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with entemptions of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lorde to remedie this euill, doth with continual examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore that they should not promisse themselves in this life a founde and quiet peace, he suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vprores, or robberies, or other injuries. That they should not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transthorstic riches, or rest in the riches that they alreadie possessed, sometime with basitishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to pouerietie, or at leaft holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much care take pleasure in the benefits of Marriage, he either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnesse of their wives, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punishment them with want of issue. But if in all these things he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either dwell with foolish glorie, or immeaturably rejoice with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases and dangers set before their eyes, how vnstable, and vanishing be all the goodes that are subject to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublsome and innumerable waies miserable and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckoned the good things thereof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with many euils mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be fought or hoped for but strive: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleue: That our minde is never truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it have first conceived a contempt of this present life.

2. For betwene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile vile in our sight, or hold vs bound with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we have any care of eternitie, we must diligently indoe to loose our selues from these fet-ters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasingmesse, grace and sweetnesse, whereewith to delight vs: it is much behoouefull for vs to be now and then called away, that we be not be-witched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done, if we did here enjoy a continuall concourse of good things & delicatit, sith we cannot with continuall spures of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not only the learned do know, but also the common people haue no Proverbe more common than this, that man life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing very profitable to be knowne, they haue set it out with many notable sentences. But there is nothing that we do either more negligently consider, or leffe remember. For we goe about all things, as though we would frame to our selues an immortalitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall, or if we walke among graves, then,because there is an image of death before our eyes, I grant we do marvellously well discouer like Philosophers vpon the vanitie of this life. Albeit we do not that continuall, for many times all these things do nothing moue vs. But when it happeneth our Philosophy lafteth but a while, which so soon as we turne our backs, vanishteth away, and leaueth no step at all of remembrance behind it: finally, it passeth away as clapping of hands vpon a fstage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also that we be subject to death, as though we had neuer heard any report thereof, fall to a careless affuirednes of earthly immortallitie. If any man in the meane time tell vs of the Proverbe, that man is a creature of a daies continuance, we grant it indeede: but so heedlesly, that still the thought of everlafting continuance refieth in our mind. Who therefore can denie, that it is a great profite to vs all, not only to be admonished in words, but by all the examples of experience that may be, to be convinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as euen when we are convinced, we scarcely cease to stand amased with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the vertemost end of good things. But if it be necessary that God instruct vs, it is our dutie lietwise on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth and awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the world we may with all our hearts endeavouer to the meditation of the life to come.

3 But let the faithfull accoumte themselues to such a deising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnhankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not slender blessings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefite of God in it, we are guilty of no small vnhankfulnes toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithfull a testimonie of Gods good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their salvation. For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternall glory, his will is to shew himselfe a Father vnto vs by smaller examples: and there be the benefits that are daily bestowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life serueth vs to understand the goodnes of God, shall we disdain it as though it had not a rum of goodnes in it? We must therefore put on this feeling and affection, to reckone it among the gifts of goodnesse that are not to be refused. For though there waite testimonies of scripture, of which there are both many moft evident, very nature it selfe doth exhort vs to give thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, that he granteath vs the vie of it, that he giuenth vs all necessarie succours for the prestation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine manner prepared to the glorie of the heavenly kingdom. For so the Lord had ordained that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heaven, must fight certaine batells in earth, that they should not triumph, till they had overcame the hard adventures of the battell, and obtained the.
Cap. 9. Of the manner how to receive the victorie. Then an other reason is, that we doe by diuerse benefites begin therein to taste the sweetnes of Gods liberalitie, that our hope and deire should be whetteth too long for the reveiling thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that we lioe this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, so we ought to be mindfull and thankfull: then we shal fall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate thereof, to this ende that we may be delivered from too much greedinesse of it, whereunto as I haue before saide, we are of our selues naurally inclined.

This life is not sim-pie to be lomted but in comparison of the life to come.

4. Now whatsoever is taken from the wrongfull deire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt indeed that they thought truely, that thought it beft not to be borne, and the next, to die quickly. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vn happie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourning and wept at the births of their frendes, and solemnly rejoied at their burials, but they did it without proflite, because being without the right doctrine of Faith, they did not see how that may turne to good to the godly, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their judgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in judging of mortall life, that when they vnderstand it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may return wholly the more feerely and readie to the eternal life to come. When we come to this comparison, then this present life may not onely be safely neglected, but also utterly despised and loathed in comparison of the other. For if Heauen be our Countrie, what is the earth else but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an entring into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to be drowned in death? If to be delievered from the body is to be fet in perfect libertie, what is the body else but a prison? If to enjoy the presence of God is the highest summe of felicitie, is it not miserable to lacke it? But till we be escaped out of the world, we wander abroad from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heavenly life, doubles it ought to be despised and troden vnderfoote. But it is never to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subjection to sin, and yet that hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must be so mooved either with wea-rines or hatred of it, that desiring the ende of it, we may be also ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, so that our wearines may be far from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he calle us away. Paul indeed lamenteth his state that he is hoden bound in the bonds of the bodie longer than he wished, and fighed with feruent desire of his redemption: neuerthelesse to obey the Commandement of the Lord, he proffessed himselfe ready to both, because he acknowledgeth himselfe to owe this unto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glory. Therefore if we must live and die to the Lord, let vs leauie to his will the time of our life and death, but so that we be still feruent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despise this life in comparision of the immortalitie to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lord because of the bondage of sinne.

5. But this is monstrous, that instede of that desire of death, many that boute themselves to be Christianes, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at every mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckely and vn happie. Truely it is no manuell, if naturall senfæ in vs doe quake for feare when we heare of the disolluing of vs. But this is in no wise tolerable, that there be not in a Christian mans breast the light of godlineffe, that should with greater comfort overcome and suppreffe that feare, how great soever it bee. For if we consider that this vnstedfaft, faultie, corruptible, fraille, withering, and rotten tabernacle of our body, is therefore disolleued, that it may afterward

afterwarde be restored againe into a stedfast, perfect, vncorruptible and heavenly glorie: shall not faith compel vs fervently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabit our countrey, as a heavenly country, shall we obtaine no comfort thereby? but there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I grant, and therefore I affirme, that we ought to looke vnto the immortality to come, where we may attaine a stedfast estate that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth very well teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cheerfully to death: not because they would bee vnclad, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shall brute beasts, yea and liuellie creatures, euene stockes and stones, knowing their present vanitie, be earneftly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrection, that they may with the children of God be delivered from vanitie, and shall we that are endued with the light of wis, and aboue wit enlightened with the spirite of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our mindes beyonde this rottennesse of earth? But it pertaint not to my present purpose, not to this place, to speake against this peruersenesse. And in the beginning I have already professed, that I would not here take vpon me the large handling of common places. I woulde counsell such fearefull mindes to reade Cyprians booke of mortality, vnlesse they were meete to be sent to the Philosophers, that they may begin to be ashamed when they see the contempt of death that those doe shewe. But this let vs holde for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christ his schoole, but he that doth joyfully looke for the day both of death and of the last resurrection. For both Paul describeth all the faithfull by this marke, and alio it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will set forth a ground of perfect gladnesse. Reioice (faie the Lord) and lift vp your heads, for your redemption commeth near at hand. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to bee of so great force to raise vp joy and cheerfulnesse in vs, should breede nothing but sorrow and discouragement? If it bee so, why doe we thinke of him as of our schoolmaster? Let vs therefore get a sounder minde, and how other the blinde and senselesse desire of the flesh doth offend it, let vs not doubt to wish for the coming of the Lord, not onely with willing, but alio with groning & sighing, as a thing most happy of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to vs, to drawe vs out of the infinite gulfe of euals and miseries, and to lead vs into that blessed inheritance of his life and glorie.

6 This is certainly true: all the nations of the faithfull, so long as they dwell in earth, must be as theye appointed to slaugeth, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnlesse they had their mindes raised vp into heaven, and surmounted all that is in the world, and passed over the present face of things. Contrariwise when they have once lifted their heads above all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying quiet peace, if they see them proud in gorgiousnes and lump-woones of all things, if they see them to flow in plentifull store of all delights, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednes, if they sustaine reproochful dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their courousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will caste vp holde themselves in such aduereties. For that day shall before their eyes, when the Lord shall receive his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdom, when he shall wipe all teares from their eyes, when he shall cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladnes, when he shall feed them with the unspeakable sweetenes of his dainties, when he shall advance them to the fellowship of his high estate, finally when he shall vouchsafe to interpret his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that have flourished in the earth, hee shall throwe into extreme shame, hee shall change their delights into torments, their laughing and myrth into weeping and gnashing of teeth, hee shall disquiet their peace with terrible torments of conscience.
Cap. 10. Of the manner how to receive conscience, he shall punish their deceitfulness with vnquenchable fire, and shall put their heads in subjection to those godly men, whose patience they have abused. For this is righteousnes (as Paul testifieth) to give release to the miserable and to them that are vnjustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe afflict the godly, when the Lord leifieth shall be revealed from heaven. This truely is our only comfort, which if it be taken away, we must of necessity either despair, or flatteringely delight our selves with the vain comforts of the world, to our own destruction. For even the Prophet confesieth that his feet staggered, when he taried too long upon considering the present prosperity of the wicked; and that he could not otherwise stand steadfast, but when he enterd into the sanctuary of God, and bended his eyes to the last end of the godly and the wicked. To conclude in one word then onely the corsse of Christ triumpheth in the harts of the faithfull upon the Diuell, flesh, sinne, and the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the resurrection.

Thee. Chapter.

How we ought to vs this present life, and the helps thereof.

By such introductions the Scripture doth also well informe vs what is the right vs of earthly benefits: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we must liue we must also vs the necessarie helps of life: neither can we eschew even those things that seeme rather to serve for delight then for necessity. Therefore we must keep a measure that we may vs them with a pure conscience, either for necessity or for delight. That measure the Lord appointeth by his worde, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine journey through a strange country, by which they trauell toward the kingdome of heaven. If we mist but paue through the earth, doubtlesse we ought to fare to vs the good things of the earth, as they may rather further then hinder our journey. Therefore Paul doth not vnprofitable counsell vs so to vs this world, as though we vsed it not: and to buy possessions with such a minde as they vs be folde. But because this place is slippery, and so slope on both sides, that it quickly maketh vs to fall, let vs labour to attain to our souere, where we may stand safely. For there haue bene some, that otherwise were good & holy men, which when they saw intemperance & riot continually to range with vnbridled lust, yielde it be harply restrained, and were desirous to correct it great mischief, they could finde none other way, but suffered man to vs the benefits of the earth, so farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were too sower. For (which is a very perillous thing) they did put streeter bonds vpon conscience, than those wherewith they were bounde by the worde of God. And they expound necessitie, to abstaine from all things that a man may bee without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarcely take any more food than brede and water. And some be yet more sower: as it is read of Crates the Theban, that did throw his goods into the sea, because if they were not deftroied, he thought that he should be deftroied by them. Many at this day, while they seeke a pretence whereby the intemperance of the flesh in vs of outward things may be excused, and while they go about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnes, do take that as a thing confessed, which I do not grant them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitation of measure, but that it is to bee left to every mans conscience vse as much as he seeth to be lawfull for him. Truly I confesse that conscience neither ought nor can in this point bee bounde by certaine and precise formes of lawes. But forasmuch as the Scripture teacheth generall rules of lawfull vs, we must surely measure the vs according to these rules.

Lett this bee a principle: that the vs of Gods gifts sheweth not out of the way; when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the author himselfe hath created and and appointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a tighter way than he that shall diligently looke into this end. Now if we consider to what end he hath created meat, we shall finde that he meant to make provision not only for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie hee appointed another ende, which is comelineffe and honestie. In herbs, trees, and frutes, beside dwers profitable vses, there is also a pleafanmmalle of fight, and sweetenesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefites of God that wine maketh glad the hart of man, and that oile maketh his face to shine, the Scripture would not encrease. And the very narturall qualitie of things doe sufficiently shew, to what ende and how faire we may vse them. Shall the Lord have fet in flowers so great a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eies: shall he have giuen so great a sweetenesse of faviour as naturally floweth into our smeling: and shall it be vnuallfull either for our eies to take the vfe of that beautie, or for our smeling to feele that sweetenesse of faviour? What? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more acceptable than other? What? Hath hee not giuen to golde and filver, to inorie and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other mettals or stones? Finally, hath he not made many things commendable vnto vs without necessitie vse?

3 Therefore away with that unnaturall Philofophie, which in graunting vs of the creatures no vse but of necessitie, not only doth negligently because vs of the lawfull vse of Gods liberalitie, but also cannot take place, ynlesse it first have spoiled man of all his senses and made him a blocke. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence provide a flay for the flut of the flie, which if it be not brought into order, overflown without measure: and it hath (as I have said) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie doe graunt vnto it all things. First there is one bridile put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this end, that we should know the author of them, and giue him thanks for his tender kindness toward vs. Where is thy thankes giuing, if thou so gluttonously fill thy felle with daintie meates or with wine, that thou either be made fentiflee, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlineffe and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy fleshe by too great abundance boiling in filthie dufft, doth with her vncleneffe infect thy minde, that thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulneffe to God, if with costly gorgeous nefte thereof we both fall in admiratio of our felues and didaine other? If with the triumfhee and cleanlineffe of it, we prepare our felues to vncharitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gayneffe of our apparell? For many so glue all their fenses to bodily delights, that the minde lieth outwhelmed. Many are so delighted with marble, gold and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into images, and be like unto painted images. The fmeell of the kitchin, or sweetenesse of faviour to dulleth some, that they can finell nothing that is spiritual. And the fame is also to be toene in the ref. Therefore it is certain that hereby the licentiousneffe of abusing is somewhat restrained, and that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the fleshe, for the lustes thereof, to which if we graunt too much, they boile out aboue measure and temper.

4 But there is no furer nor readie way than that which is made vs by the commette of this present life, and the meditation of heavenly immortallitie. For thereupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vs this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that marry wines, as though they did not marry: they that buy, as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne, as well to beare pouerous, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately.
Cap. 10. Of the manner how to receive

He that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not onely the intemperance of gluttonie in meate and drinke, and too much deinti-nelle, sumptuounesse, pride, hautineffe, and niceness, in fare, building, and apparell, but alfo all care and affections that may either withdraw thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heavenly life, or from studie to garnish thy soule. But this was long ago truly laid of Cato: that there is great carefulness of trimming our bodie, and great care-leffene of vertue. And it is an olde prouerbe, that they which are much bulled in care of their body are commonly careleff of their soule. Therefore, although the liberric of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truly it must be subject to this lawe, to beare very little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon themselues with continually bent minde, to cut off all stuffe of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excesses, and to take diligent heed, that they doe not of helpers make to themselves hindrances.

5 The other rule shall be, that they that have but small and slender riches, may lerne to lache patiently, that they be not carefulllly moued with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that keepe, have not a little profited in the Lords toole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely have any thing whereby to procure himselfe the choller of Christ. For beforde this that the most part of other vices doe accompanie the desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouerlie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which will be ashamed of a poore coate, will be proud of a costly coate: he that will not be content with a hungrie supper, will bee disquieted with desire of a daintier, and would also intemperately abuse those dainties if he had them: he that hardly and vnquietly beareth a private and bafe estate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that have an unslain zeal of godlinesse, endeavour to learne by the Apostles example, to be full and hungrie, to haue store, and suffer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the precepts of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so gien vs by the bountifulnesse of God, and appointed for our commodity, that they may be as things deliuered vs to keepe, whereof we must one day yeeld an accout. We must therefore so dispose them, that this laying may continually found in our cares, yeeld an accout of thy bailiwick. Therewhile let this also come in our minde. Who it is that asketh such an accout, euen he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobrietie, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuounesse, pride, ostentation, and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goodes, but such as is joined with charitie: which hath already with his owne mouth condemned all those delightfull things that doe withdraw a mans mind from chafltie and cleansesse, or doe still his wit with darkennesse.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth every one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great un-quietenesse mans wit boyleth, with how skipping lightnesse it is caried hither and thil-ther, how greedi his ambition is to holde divers things at once. Therefore that all things should not be confounded with our follie and raillation, he hath appointed to every man his dutie in severall kinds of life. And that no man rashly run beyond his bounds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therefore everie mans severall kinde of life is vnto him as it were his standing appointed him by God, that they should not all their life vncertainly wander about. And this dutie is so necessi-fate, that all our doings are measure thereby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the judgement of mans reaon and Philosophie. There is no deede accounted more noble, euen among the Philosophers, than for a man to deliver his country fro Oyranyny: but by the voice of Gods judgement the private man is openly condemned

that layeth hand upon a tyrant. But I will not tarry upon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we know that the calling of the Lorde is in every thing the beginning & foundation of well doing: to which hee that doth not direct himselfe, shall never keepe a right way in his doings. He may peradventure sometime do somewhat seeming worthie of praise: but whatsoever that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shall be rejected: moreover there shall be no convenient agreement in the parts of his life. Therefore our life shall then be best framed, when it shall be directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne righteousnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his bounds. He that shall be a man of base estate, shall contentedly live a private life, left he should for sake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Against this shall be no small relief to cares, labours, griefes and other burdens, when a man shall knowe that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the housholder will bind his selfe to his dutie: every man in his kind of life will beare and passe through the discomforts, cares, tediousnes, and anguishes thereof: when they are persuaded that every man's burden is laide vpon him by God. Hereupon also he shall grow singular comfort, forasmuch as there shall be no worke so filthy and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the iustification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I thinke I have alreadie sufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men The master of iustification, the chiefest stain whereby religion is upheld, being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recover salvation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefits of God it beftoweth vpon man, and what fruits it bringeth forth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is giuen vs by the goodness of God, and conceiued and possest of vs by faith, by partaking of whom we receive principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may now in stead of a judge have a mercifull father in heaven: the second, that being sanctified by his spirit, we may give our selves to innocencie, and purenes of life. As for regeneration, which is the second grace, we have already spoken of it as much as seemed to be sufficient. The manner of iustification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to understande both howe the Faith by which alone we receive freely giuen righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good worke: and also what be the good worke of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are first to be thoroughly discoursed, & so discoursed that we must remember that this is the chiefest staye of upholding religion, that we may be the more carefull and heedfull about it. For vnlesse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his judgement is of thee: as thou haft no grounde to stablish thy salvation, so haft thou also none to raise thy reverent feare towards God. But the necessitie of this knowledge shall better appeare by knowledge it selfe.

2 But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should do if we should enter quizzation of a thing vnknown) let vs first declare what is ment by these speeches, Man to be iustified before God, To be iustified by faith or by worke. He is said to be iustified before God, that is pronounced by the judgement of God both lust & accepted for his owne rightouinesse sake. For as wickednesse is abominable before God, so a sinner cannot finde favour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore wherefoever sinner is, there also appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a just man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the judgement seat of God when all sinners fall. As if an innocent be brought to be arraigned before the seat of a righteous judge, when judgement is given according to his innocencie, he is faide to be justified before the judge: so he is justified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witness and affirmer of his righteousness. Therefore after the same manner a man shall be faid to be justified by works, in whose life there is found such cleanliness and holines, as may declare the testimonie of righteousness before the throne of God; or he that with the vprightnesse of his workes is able to answer and satisfie Gods judgement. Contrariwise he shall be faid to be justified by faith that being excluded from the righteousness of workes, doth by faith take hold of the righteousness of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the fight of God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expound justification to be an acceptance, whereby God receiveth us into favour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiveness of sins, and imputation of the righteousness of Christ.

Of the manner how to receive

Proofs that justification is taken for Gods acquitting men from his imputing unto them the righteousness which is in Christ.

not righteous in our selves. So in the 13. Chapter of the Acts, in Paulus sermon: by Acts. 13. 38. him is forgiveness of sins preached unto you, and every one that believeth in him is justified from all those things, from which you could not be justified in the Law of Moses. You see that after forgiveness of sins, justification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for abolution, you see that it is taken away from the works of the Law, you see that it is the mere benefitall gift of Christ, you see that it is received by faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where he faith that we are justified from sins by Christ. So when it is said that the Publican came justified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousness by any deferving of works. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his sins obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approoving of works, but by Gods free abolution. Wherefore Ambrose layeth very well, that calleth the confession of sins a lawfull justificaction.

4. But to leave straining about the word: If you look upon the thing itself, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truly Paul doth express the justification by the name of acceptance, when he saith (Eph. 1. 5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christ, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious favour, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in favour. For the same is meant by it that is faide in another place, that God doeth freely justifie.

In the 4. Chapter to the Romans, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousness, and flieth not to say that it consisteth in forgiveness of sins. That man (said he) is called of David a blessed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteousness without works, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truely he there doth intend not of one part of justification, but of all justification wholly. And he testifieth that David in that place maketh a definition of justification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is given free forgiveness of sins. Whereby appeareth that this righteousness whereof he speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrary to guiltinesse. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth that this is the simme of the message of the Gospel, that we should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receive vs into favour through Christ, in not imputing sins vnto vs. Let the Readers diligently weigh at the whole procee of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to express the manner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing else by the word reconciling but justifying. And that which he saith in another place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, unless we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our selves.

5. But where as Osundre hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiel righteousness, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousness, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkenth godly minde, and bereareth them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is worth the labor to confute this doting error. First this speculation is but of meere and hungry curiositie. He doth in deed heape together many testimonies of Scripture, to prove that Christ is one with vs, and we one with him, which needeth no proove: but because he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he inareth himselfe. But we which hold that we are made all one with Christ by the power of his spirit, may easly vdoe all his knots. He had conceived a certaine thing, very neere to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to convey the substance of God into men. Hereupon risingeth the opinion of that Adam was fashioned after the Image of God, because even before the fall Christ was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I will tarry vp to the matter that I have presently in hand. Hec faith that we are one with Christ. We grant. But we deny that the substance of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreover we say that this principle, that Christ is righteous instead of us, because he is an eternall God, the fountaine of righteousness and the verie felfe righteousness of God, is wrongfully drawn to defende his deceites. Therefore all pardon me, if I do now but touch these things that the order of teaching required to be deferred unto another place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing else by the name of essentia righteousettiee, but to refite this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christes sake: yet he plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousettiee that is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but gaineth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substance as by qualitie powred into vs. For this is the reason why he doth earnestly affirmeth, that no one Christ, but also the Father and the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs. Which although I graunt to be true, yet I say that hee wrongfully wretiteth it. For he should have considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the father and the holy Ghost are in Christ, and as the fulniffe of the Godhead dwel-steth in him, so do wee possesse whole God in him. Therefore all that he faith feuerally of the father and the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other end but to draw the simple from Christ. And then hee througheth in a mixture of substances, whereby God powring himselfe into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himselfe. For he reckeneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we grove into one with Christ, and that he is our head and wee his members, vnisces his very substance be mingled with vs. But in the father and the holy Ghost (as I have said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinkest, even this, that we be justifiecd not by the onely grace of the Mediator, and that righteousettiee is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteousettiee of God, when God is eternally made one with vs.

6 If he did say no more, but that Christ in justifying vs, is by essentia conoiyning made ours: and that not oneye he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the divine nature is powred into vs: He should with lefhe hurt feele himselfe daintily, and peradventurc to great a contention should not have beenrai fied for this doing error. But fith this beginning is like a cistle that with casting out of blacke and thicke blood hidcheth her many tailes, we must needs earnestly refit vnlesse we will wittingly and willingly suffer that righteousettiee to be taken from vs, which onely bringeth vs confidence to glorie of salvation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousettiee, and this word justifying, extend to two parts: that to be justifiecd is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteousettiee is not a free imputations but a holy, felfe and vprighteousettiee, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then hee stoutly denyet, that Christ is our righteousettiee in respect that being a priest he did with satisfactorily purging fannes appeasse his father toward vs, but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To prooove that first point, that God doeth justifie not onely by forgiving but also by regenerating, hee asketh whether God doeth leave them whom he dooth justifie such as they were by nature, chaunging nothing of their vices. The answere hereof is verie cattie: that as Christ cannot be borne in partes, so those two things which we together and joyntly receive in him, that is to say righteousettiee and faancification, are inseparable. Therefore, whomsoever God receiueth into faavour, he doth also therewithall give them the spirit of adoption, by the power whereof he newly fashioneth them after his image. But if the brightenesse of the sunne cannot bee feared from the heat thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heat? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude. The sunne with his heate giueth life and fruitfulenesse to the earth, with his beames he giueth light and brightenesse. Here is a mutual and inseparable conoiyning: yet reason forbiddeth to convey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurdity is in this confusion of two forces of graces, that Osiander trutheth in. For because God doth in deceased renew them to the obtaining of righteousness whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptance, and affirmeth that they be all one, and the self same thing. But the Scripture saying them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifolde grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that Christ was given vnto righteousness and sanctification. And whensoever he reasoneth to prooue by the salvation purchased for vs by the fatherly love of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holiness and cleanliness, he plainly declareth, that it is one thing to be justified, and another to be made newe creatures.

But when Osiander commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he allegeth. Where Paul faith that Faith is accounted for righteousness vnto him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that justifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he depraucheth all the fourth Chapter to the Romines, and sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euene now allledged, Who shal accuse the electes of God? it is God that justifieth: where it is plain that he speaketh simply of guiltines and acquiting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osiander is found too fond a babbler, as well in that reason as in alllegend the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he speake of the name of righteounesse, in saying that Faith was accounted to Abraham for righteounesse, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteounesse of God and God himselfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteounesse that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he receiued by Faith the grace offered in the promise. Whereupon followed, that in justificacion there is noe place for works, as Paul very well affirmeth.

7 As forthis that Osiander objecteth, that the power of justifying is not in Faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiued Christ, I willingly grant it. For if Faith did justifie of it selfe, or by inward force, as they call it, and as it is alway feele and unperfect it could not worke justificacion but in part, so should the justificacion be mayned, that should give vs but a piece of justificacion. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking doe say that God onely justifieth: and then we give the same to Christ, because he was given vnto righteounesse: and Faith vs compare as it were to a vessel. For except we came emprie with open mouth of our Soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receive Christ. Whereupon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of justifying, when we teach that he is first receiued by Faith, before that his righteounesse be receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when he sayeth that Faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a creature, because gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not unlike, but that Faith although it be by it selfe of no worthieffe or price, may justifie vs in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that Faith, which is onely the instrument to receive righteounesse, is unstly mingled with Christ which is the materall cause and both Author and Minister of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolued. How this word Faith ought to be understond when we treat of justificacion.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the inward word is receiued by the ministration of the outward word, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthood of Christ and the person of the Mediatour to his outward Godhead.

As for us, we divide not Christ, but we say that he is the same eternall word of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gave vs righteousnes: and we confesse that otherwise he could not have fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchased vs righteousnes, vniuffle he had beene eternall God. But this is Ofsanders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that he was made righteousnes to vs, in respect of his nature of Godhead, and not of manhood. But if this properly belong to the Godhead, then it shall not be peculiar to Christ, but common with the father and the holy ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousnes of the one, and another of the other. Moreover, that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conveniently said to be made to vs. But although we grant this, that God was made righteousnes for vs: how shall it agree that that which is set betwene, is made of God? Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is feuerely discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But he foolishly triumpheth in that one word of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lord Ichoua shall be our righteousnes, but out of that hee shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnes, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In another place we have rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that God purchased to himselfe the Church with his blood, if any man gather thereupon, that the blood wherewith sins were purged was divine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can abide to sole an error? But Ofsander thinketh that with this so childlith a caulation he hath gotten all things he swelleth, he leareth for joy, and stufeth so many leues full with his bigge words: when ye further is a plaine and reade solution for it in saying that the word Ichoua indeed when he is made the issue of David shall be the righteousnes of the godly: But Efay teacheth in what fene, saying: My justerant shall with knowledge of himselfe instrue many. Let vs note that the father speaketh: that he giueth to the son the office of instructing: he addeth a cause, for that he is just, and setteth the maner or meanes, as they call it in the doctrine whereby Christ is known. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this word Ichoua knowledge passively. Hereupon I gather first that Christ was made righteousnes when he did put on the forme of a servant: secondly, that he did instruct vs in respect that he shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore hee doth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed unto him. For although God alone is the fountain of righteousnes, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappy disagreement estranged from his righteousnes we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may instruct vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

9. If he object that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is above the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribbed but to the nature of God, the first I say: but in the second I say that he is unwisely deceived. For although Christ could neither cleanse our soules with his blood, nor appease his father with his sacrifise, nor acquire vs from guiltiness, nor do the office of a priest, vnisse he had beene true God, because the strength of the flesh had beene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he perforemed all these things according to his nature of manhood. For if it be demanded how we be instructed, Paul answereth, by the obedience of Christ. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking upon him the shape of a servant? whereupon we gather that righteousnes was gien vs in his flesh, Likewise in the other words (which I manuell that Ofsander is not ashamed to alleage so often) hee appointeth the fountain of righteousnes nothing else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe no sinne hee made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. Ofsander with full mouth advanceth the righteousnesse of God, and triumpheth as though he had grounded that it is his imaginative ghost.

ghost of essential righteousness: when the words sound far otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young beginners should not have been ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in John, where the glory of God is compared with the glory of men. I know that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof God is the author and which God giveth us: but though I say nothing, the Readers that have their sound wit, do perceive that nothing else is meant in this place, but that we stande upright before the judgement-seat of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christ's death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that if we agree with us in this point that we are justified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propitiatory sacrifice for us, which cannot agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sort, when Christ meaneth to seal the righteousness and salvation that he hath brought us, he setteth before us an assur'd pledge thereof in his flesh. He doth in deed call himselfe the luyse bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his blood is verily drinke. Which manner of teaching is seen in the sacraments, which although they direct our faith to whole Christ, and not to half Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousness and salvation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that he is onely man, he either inustifie or quickeneth of himselfe, but because it pleased God to shewe openly in the mediatour that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon we are wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountain set open for vs, out of which we may draw that which otherwise should without fruit be hid in that close and deep spring that riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the mediatour. In this manner & meaning, I do not deny that Christ as he is God & man doth inustifie vs, and that this is also the workes of the Father and the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousness whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, is the eternal righteousness of the eternall God, so that he yeeldeth to the sure and plaine reasons that I have alledged.

10 Now that he should not with his caullations deceiue the vnskilfull, I grant that we want this incomparably benefite, till Christ be made ours. Therefore wee see that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hartes, and that mystical union, in the highest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not behold him a farre off of our selves, that righteousness may be imputed vnto vs, but because we have put on him, and are graffed into his body: finallly because hee hath vouchsafed to make vs one with him, therefore we glorifie that we have a fellowship of righteousness with him. So is Ofanders flanderous caullation confuted, where hee faith that we count faith righteousness, as though we spoile Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith empry to him, to give roume to his grace, that he onely may fill vs. But Ofander refusing this spirituall conioyning, enforceth a groffe mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiously calleth them Zwingiants that subscribe not to his fantastical error, concerning essentiaal righteousness: because they do not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lords supper. As for me, I count it a great glory to be so reprochd of a proud man and given to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but also other writers well known to the world, whom he ought to haue modestly reverenced. It moueth me nothing, which meddle not with mine owne private cause: and so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Whereas therefore he so importunately requirith essentiaal righteousness, and the essentiaal dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this ende: first that God should with a groffe mixture pour himselfe into vs, as hee faineth a fleshely eating of Christ in the supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousness into vs, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this this righteousness as well God himselfe, as the goodness or holiness, or pureneffe of God. I will not spend much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heavenly life to this present state. Through Christ (as faith Peter) are given vs the precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were now such as the Gospel promised that we shall be at the last coming of Christ: yea, John testifieth vs, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shall be like unto him. Only I thought good to give a small taste to the readers, that I do of purpose passe over these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

But in the second point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I think I have already sufficiently proved, that although this doctrine were not so pestilent yet because it is colde and frustsle, and of it felle to vaine that it melthe away, it ought worthy to be vnfaourire to sound and godly Readers. But this is an intolerable wickednesse, under pretence of double righteousness, to enenble the earnest assurance of salvation, and to carie vs above the cloudes, that we should not embrace by faith the grace of propition, and call upon God with quiet mindes. Ofander scorneth them, that teach that this word Justifying is a true term: because we must be righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be justified by free imputation. But if God do not impute vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be judged righteous that be reconciled to God. The manner how is declared, for that God justifieth by forgiving, as in another place justification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparith of them as contraries, doth clearly shew that it is a phrase borrowed from the vie of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanely practiced in the Hebrew tongue, if he have a sober braine, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and wherunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Now where Paul faith that David described the righteousness without worke. in these words, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiven: Let Ofander anfwere me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witness, as though he taught that forgivenesse of sinnes is but a part of righteousness, or a thing that joyneth with other to the justifying of man. But he includeth whole righteousness in free forgivenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are covered, to whom God hath forgiven infiniquities, and to whom he imputeth no transgressions. He both measure and judge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous indeede, but by imputation. Ofander taketh exercise and faith, that this should be flamboyant to God, and contrarie to his nature, if he should justifie them that in deed remaine still wicked. But we must remember, as I have already faide, that the grace of justifying is not feared from regeneration although they be seuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowne by experience, that there abide alwayes in the righteous some remnantes of sinne, it must needs be that they be forre otherwise justified than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation, God do beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by little and little, and sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his face in danger of the judgement of death. But he justifieth them not by partnecale, but to that they may freely, as clothed with the pureneffe of Christ, appear in heaven. For no portion of righteousness could appease our conscience, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because we be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of justification is miscarried, yea, overturned from the very foundation, whè doubting is cast into men's minds, when the affiance of satisfaction is shaken, when the free and dreadful invocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquility with spiritual joy is not established. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to prove, that the inheritance is not by the law. For by this mean faith should be made void, which if it have respect to works, is overthrown, because none of the most holy shall there-in finde whereupon to trust. This difference of justifying and regenerating (which two things Osander confounding together, calleth two sorts of righteousness is very well expressed by Paul: for speaking of his real righteousness in deed, or of the vprighteousness wherewith he was ended (which Osander nameth essential righteousness) he lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliver me from the body of this death? But flying to the righteousness which is grounded upon the Rom.8.39.

only mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth over both life, death, reproaches, hunger, sword, and all adversities. Who shall accuse the elects of God whom he justifieth? For I am fully persuaded, that nothing shall sever us from his love in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousness which alone fully sufficeth to salvation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a little before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glorie. This dureouritie is sufficiently known, and so familiar to all the holy ones, that gone under the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp above all feares. As for this that Osander objecteth, that it disagreeith with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holy ones with a double righteousness as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse that without forgiveness of sinnes they never pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him grant, that they which are not righteous in deed, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how farre shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousness? shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? Truly he shall hang doubtfull and wavering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousness as he alwaies needeth to stabill confidence. It is happie that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not judge of this cause. But this shall stand readie, that thou maist be infulled in thy sayings and overcome when thou art judged. But how great presumption is it to condemn the chiefe judge when he freely acquireth, that this aunswered may not be inforce, I will have mercie vpon whom I will have mercie. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this end that he should spare none, but that he should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offence. And we do say that they which were left have their sinnes burdened, and are justifieth before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he can love none but them whom he justifieth. But this is a marvellous manner of justifying, that they being covered with the rightouenes of Christ stand not in feare of the judgement which they have deferred, and when they worthy condemn themselves are accounted righteous without themselves.

12 But the readers are to be warned, that they take good heed to the mystical which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely travented to prove that we do not obtaine favour with God by the only impuation of the righteousness of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (albeit his owne words) at length he concludes that Christ was given vnto righteousness, not in respect of his nature of manhood but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousness cannot be found but in the person of the Mediator, yet it is the righteousness not of man but of God, he doeth now binde vp his rope made of two righteousnesses, but he plainly taketh away the office of justifying from Christ: his nature of manhood. But it is good to see how he disagreeeth. It is saide in the same place, that Christ was made vnto vs wisedome, which belongeth to none but to the eternall wordes. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisedome. I answer that the onely begotten sonne of God was in deed his eternall wisedome, but in Paul's writings that name is given him in duers wise, because all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge are laid vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he disclosed vnto vs: and so that which Paul faith is not vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our vs, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhood: because although he shined a light in darkness, before that he did put on flesh, yet it was a hidden light till the same Christ came foorth in the nature of man, the shining sonne of righteousness, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the world. Also it is foolishly objected of him, that the power of justifying is farre above both Angels and men: for so much as this hangeth not upon the wondrous of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels wil take vp them to satisfy God, they can nothing preuaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subject to the law, to redeeme vs from the curse of the law. Also he doth flaunderously cauall, that they which deny that Christ is our righteousness according to his nature of Godhead, doe leave but one part of Christ, and (which is worse) doe make two Gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they lay againe that we are not righteous by the righteousness of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we doe not by and by take away that honor from whole Christ as he was openly showed God in the flesh, but we only make a distinction how the righteousness of God is conuerted vnto vs, that we may enjoy it. In which point of ander hath too fowly erred. Neither doe we deny that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, proceedeth from the secret grace and power of God: and we strive not against this, that the righteousness which Christ gaueth vs is the righteousness of God that proceedeth from God: but we hold this fidedafly, that we have righteousness and life in the death and resurrection of Christ. I ouerpaife that heaping together of places whereof he may we be ashamed, wherewith he hath sediously combed the readers without choise and without common reason, to proue that wherefore is made mention of righteousness, there ought to be understood this essentia1 righteousness. As where David calleth upon the righteousness of God to helpe him: whereas he doth in summe above an hundred times, of ander sticketh not to corrupt to many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other objection, that that is properly and rightly called righteousness, whereby we be moued to doe rightly, but that God onely worketh in vs both to will and to performe. For we doe alio not deny, but that God reformeth vs with his spirit vnto holinesse of life and righteousness: but wee must stift see whether he doe this by himselfe and immediately, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left all the fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the neede of his members. Moreover, although righteousness come vnto vs out of the secret fountain of the Godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteous vnto vs according to his nature of Godhead. No leffe fonde is that which he faith, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousness of God. Because unless the will of his father had moued him, he coulde not himselfe have satisfied the office committed vnto him. For though we haue in another place saide, that all the devisings of Christ himselfe doe proceed from the meer good wil of God, yet that makest nothing to that fantastical thing, wherewith of ander bewitcheth both his owne and simple mens eies. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountain and beginning of our righteousness, therefore we be essentially righteous, & the essence
the grace of Christ.

The Apostle faith that he esteemed all things as doing, that he might winne Christ, Rom. 10. 3.

and finde in him the righteousness that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousness that is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Jesus Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries, and that here is declared that he which will obtaine the righteousness of Christ, must forfake his owne righteousness. Therefore in another place he faith, that this was the caufe of fall to the Jews, that Rom. 10. 3-going about to stablifh their owne righteousness, they were not subjed to the righteousnesse of God. If in stablifhing our owne righteousness we shake away the righteousnesse of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousness our owne must be utterly abolished. And he sheweth the fame thing, when he faith, that our glorying is not excluded by the lawe, but by faith. Whereupon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousness of works, how little soever it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorie vpon. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousness of works can no wife be coupled with the righteousness of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romans, that he taught no roume for caullations or shifts: If faith he) Abraham was justified by works, he hath glorie. And immeditely he addeth: but he hath no glorie in the light of God. It followeth therefore that he was not justified by works. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to works, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deservings of works. Wherefore far well their dreame, that imagine a righteousness made of faith and workes mingled together.

Rom. 4. 5.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they have a little shift, that make to themselves sport and pastime with wretshing of Scripture and with vaine caullations. For they expound workes in that place to be those which men not yet regenerate do only literally and by the endeouer of free will without the grace of Christ: and do say that it belongeth not to spiritual workes. So by their opinion a man is justified both by faith and by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ and fruits of regeneration. For they say that Paul speake so for none other cause, but to convince the Jewes, trusting vp on their owne workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousness to themselves, sith the onely spirit of Christ doeth give it vs, and not any indenour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparision of the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of the Gospel, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title soever they be adored. For he teacheth that this is the righteousness of the law, that he should obtaine salvation that hath perfommed that which the law commandeth: and that this is the righteousness of faith, if we beleue that Christ died and is risen a-gaine. Moreover wee shall hereafter shew in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteousness are feuerall benefices of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the veste spiritual workes come not into the account when the power of justifying is ascribed.
Cap. 11. Of the manner how to receive to Faith. And where Paul denieth (as I even now allledged) that Abraham had any thing wherupon to glory before God, because he was not made righteous by works: this ought not to be restrained to the literall and outward kinds of virtues, or to the endearment of free will. But although the life of the Patriarch Abraham were spiritual and in manner angelike, yet he had not sufficient deservings of works to purchase him rightouenes before God.

15 The Schoolemen reach a little more grossly that mingle their preparations but these doe leffe infect the simple and unskillfull with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretence of Spritue and grace hiding the mercie of GOD which onely is able to appease trembling conferences. But we confesse with Paul that the doers of the Lawe are justyfied before God: but because we are all farre from the keeping of the Lawe, hereupon we gather, that the works which should most of all have attailed to rightouenes, doe nothing helpe vs because we lacke them. As for the common Papites or Schoolemen, they are in this point doubly deceived: both because they call Faith an affiurednes of confience in looking for reward at the hand of God for deservings, and also because they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of rightouenes, but the holy Ghoft helping to the endeuer of holines. They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first believe that there is a God, and then that he is a renderer of reward to them that feke him. But they mark not what is the manner of seeking. And that they are deceived in the name of grace, is plainly proued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that justyfication by Christ is gien vs two waies, Firft (faith he) the death of Christ doth justyfee vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hartes, by which we are made rightoues. Secondly, that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Satan held vs captive, so that now he hath not whereby to condemn vs. You see he considereth the grace of God principally in justyfication to be fo far as we are directed to good works by the grace of the holy Ghoft. He would forsooth have followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a far off and goeth far out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine have spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it: if there be any thing in Augustine not very vnapure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen have still straied from wooffe to wooffe, till with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the very sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be receyved. For though he singularly well taketh it to man al praise of rightouenes, and aligneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby we are renewed into newenes of life by the holy Ghoft.

16 But the Scripture, when it speakes of the rightouenesse of Faith, leadeth vs to a far other end, that is to say, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne workes, we should onely looke vnto the mercie of God and perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of justyfication, that first God vouchsaufheth to embrace man being a sinner with his mercie and free goodnes, confidering nothing in him but mercy whereby he may be moued to mercy, forasmuch as he feeth him altogether naked and void of good workes, fetcheth from himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which desparing vp vpon his owne workes caufeth all the summe of his salvation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of Faith, by which the sinner commeth into possession of his salvation, when he acknowledge by the doctrine of the Gospell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining foruengenes of sinnes by meanes of the rightouenes of Christ, he is justyfied: and although he be regenerate by the Spirite of God, he thinketh vpon continual rightoueness laid vp for him not in the good workes to which he applieth himselfe, but in the onely rightouennes of Christ. When these things shall be every one particularly wuced, they shall give a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are fet forth. But it maketh little little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that we may have the whole matter truly declared andsurely proved.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that we have before saide to be betwene faith and the Gospel: because it is saide for this cause that faith includeth, for that it receiveth and embraceth the righteounesse offered in the Gospel. And whereas it is saide to be offered by the Gospel, tbery all consideration of works is excluded. Which thing Paul doth declare many times elsewhere, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romans, comparing the lawe and the Gospel together he faith: the righteounesse: that is by the law is thus, The man that doth these things shall live in them. But the righteounesse that is of faith offereth salvation, if thou belieue in thy hart and confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Gospel, that the law giueth righteounesse to works, and the Gospel giueth free righteounesse without helpe of works? it is a notable place, and that may deliver vs out of many hard doubts, if we understande that the same righteounesse that is giuen vs by the Gospel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once with great seeming of contrarietie set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the lawe, then is it not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truly the law it selfe hath aloher promises. Therefore there must needs be in the promises of the Gospel, something distinct and divers from the promises of the lawe, vnlesse we will confesse that the comparision is very fond. But what diuersitie shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and vpHolden by the one mercie of God, whereas the promises of the lawe hang upon the condition of works? Neither let any man here carpe against me, and say, that in this place the righteounesse is rejected which men of their owne force and free will would compell God to receiue? for as much as Paul without exception teacheth that the lawe in commanding proficeth nothing: because there is none notouly of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfilleth it. Loewe doubtlesly is the chiefe point of the lawe: when the spirit of God frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteounes, but for that euin in the hole ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it selfe defequeth no reward.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is iustified by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall live in them. Howe could this argument otherwise stand together, vnlesse we agree upon this point, that works come not into the account of faith, but are vterly to be feuered from it? The law (faith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because works are required to the righteounes thereof. Therefore it followeth that works are not required to the righteounes of faith. By this relation it appeareth that they which are iustified by faith are iustified beside the deseruing of works, yea without the deseruing of works, because faith receiveth that righteounes which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospel differeth from the lawe in this point, that it bindeth not righteounes to works, but setteth it in the onely mercy of God. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romans, that Abraham had nothing to glory vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteounes, and he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteounes of faith, when there are no works to which a reward is due. Where he workes (faith he) due reward is rendred vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the very meaning of the words that he saith in that place iust to proue the same. Whereas he addeth within a little after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hee addeth the condition that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is receiued by faith: and how commeth that, but because faith without any helpe of works leaneth wholly vpon the mercy of God? And in the same meaning without: without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousness of God was openly shewed without the law, although it hath witness borne of it by the law and the Prophets: because excluding the law, he faith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtain it not by working, but come emipte that we may receive it.

19 By this time the Reader perceiveth with what equitie the Sophisters doe at this day caull at our doctrine, when we faie, that man is justified by faith only. They dare not deny that man is justified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onely, is never expressed, they cannot abide to have such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these wordes of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely gien? How can free gift agree with works? And with what caullations will they mock out, that which he faith in another place, that the righteousness of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospel? If righteousness be manifestly shewed in the Gospel, surely therein is containd not a tume or halfe righteousness, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stande upon not onely a false but also a foolish shift about this exclusive word, Onely. Doth not he perfectly enough gie all things to onehe faith, that taketh all things from works? What, I pray you mean these sayings, that righteousness was manifestly shewed without the law: that man is justified freche and y without the works of the law? Heere they haue a wittie shift to escape withall, which although they deme it not themselues, but borrowed it of Origen and certaine of the olde writers, yetes were foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall works of law, not the morall, are excluded. They professe with continuall brawling, that they know not the verie first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostile doth when he alledged these places to proove his sayings? The man that shall doe these things shall live in them: and, Cursed is every one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the volume of the law. Vnlesse they be madde, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatened onely to the breakers of them. If these places bee to bee vnderstanded of the morall lawe, it is no doubt that the morall works also are excluded from the power of justifying.

To the same purpose serue these arguments that he vslie: because the knowledge of finne was by the law, therefore righteousness is not by the law. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousness. Because the lawe cannot make confidence assurued, therefore also it cannot giue righteousness. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousness, therefore righteousness is not a rewarde of works, but is gien being not due. Because we are justified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had bin a law gien that might giue life, then righteousness were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all vnder finne that the promis mighte be giVEN to the beleeuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoked of ceremonies and not of maners: but very children woulde hiffe out so great flammeleshe. Therefore let vs hold this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of justifying is taken away from the law.

20 But if any man maruaile why the Apostile vseth such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although works be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of anie righteousness of works, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claim anie reward as due vnto them, but such as he hath promised? They have therefore this of the bountifullnes of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name & reward of righteousness: and they be of value onely for this cause, when the purpose of him that doth them is by them to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostile in another place, to proove that Abraham could not be justified by works, alageeth that the law was gien, almost foure hundred and thirty yeres after the covenante made.

Unlearned
Unlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous works before the publishing of the law. But because he knew that there was no such value in works but by the testimony and vouchsaying of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the law they had no power to justify. We understand why he namely expresseth the worke of the law, when he meaneth to take away justification from any works because contrary may be moued of those and none other. Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he faith that by the testimonie of David blessednes is assignd to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousnesse without works. Therefore they can with no caullations bring to passe, but that we shall get this general exclusion only. And they do in vain seeke that trifling suttlet, that we are justified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousnesse must stand vpon loue. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith justifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of justifying from that effectuallnesse of charitie. Ye it doth by no other meanes but loue, because it bringeth vs into the communicatie of the righteousnesse of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly prescibeth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh faith he the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to deed. And to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that justifieth the unrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse. Could he speake more evidently then in this saying? that there is no righteousnesse of faith but where there are no works to which any reward is due: and that only then faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, when righteousnesse is given by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is said in the definition, that the righteousnesse of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth upon the onely forgivenesse of sinnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth vpon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath I say excellently well lett out in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortned, that he is not able to save: nor his ear dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities haue made disagreement betweene you and your God, and your sinnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the diuision betwixt man and God, and the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousnesse to haue any fellowship with sinne. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enemic to God till he be restored into favour by Christ. Whome therefore the Lord receiueth into ioyning with him, him he is said to justifie: because he can neither receive him into favour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgivenesse of sinnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be iudged by their works, they shall be found still sinners in deede, yet must be free and cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God imbrace, are no otherwhise made righteous, but because they are cleansed by haung the spots of their sinnes wiped away by forgivenesse, that suche righteousness may in one word be called the forgivenesse of sinnes.

22 Both these are most cleare to be seene by these words of T.aul, which I haue already allsaged: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing their sinnes to man, and it hath left with vs the worde of reconciliation. And then he addeth the surname of his meffer, that him which knew no sinne he made sinner for vs, that we might be made the rightconfitte of God in him. Here he nameth righteousness and reconciliation without difference: that we may perceive that the one is mutuallly contained under the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this rightconfitte to be when our sinnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth justifie vs, when thou hearest he doth reconcile vs to himselfe, by not imputing sinnes. So to the Romans he prooueth by the testimonie.
Of the maner how to receiue testimonie of David, that righteousnesse is imputed to man without works, because David pronounceth the man blefled whose iniquities are forgiuen, whose finnes are couered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by blefdenedesse he there meane the righteousnesse. As fith he affirrneth the fame to stand in the forgiuenesse of finnes, there is no caufe why we should otherwife define it. Therfore Zacharie the father of John the Baptist fingeth that the knowledge of saluation conffiteth in the forgiuenesse of finnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the fumne of saluation, as Luke report-teth it, concluded in this maner: By him forgiuenesse of finnes is preached vnto you, and euerie one that belcuceth in him is forfiuen from all these things, from which ye could not be forfiuen, in the lawe of Mofes. The Apostle do knitteth the forgiuenesse of finnes with righteousnes, that he sheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reafoneth that the righteousnesse is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnesse of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange vnufed speech, that the faithfull are righteous before God, not by works, but by free accep-tation: fith both it is fo oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also doe sometime to speake. For Augustine faith thus in one place: The righteousnesse of the finns in this worlde standeth rather in forgiuenesse of finnes, than in perfection of ver-tues. Wherewith agreeeth the notable fentence of Bernard: Not to finnes is the righteousnesse of God: but the righteousnesse of man is the mercifull kindnesse of God.

He had before afhrnet that Chrift is to vs righteousnesse in abolution, and therefore that they onely are righteous that have obtained pardon by merce.

The righteousnesse of Chrift imputed vnto vs makes vs righteous.

of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimonie of righteousnesse in the sight of God. The words of Ambrose are these. Whereas Isaac smelt the savour of the garments, peradventire this is meant thereby, that we are not justified by works, but by faith: because fleshly weaknesses hindreth works, but the brightness of faith which merits forgivenenes of sins, overshadoweth the errour of deeds. And truly so it is. For, that we may appeere before the face of God unto salvation, it is necessary for us to smell sweetly with his odour, and to have our faults covered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That to the end we may be fully persuaded of the free justification, we must lift up our minds to the judgement seat of God.

Although it appeareth by most evident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not cleerely perceiue how necessarie they be, vnless we have set before our eyes those things that ought to be the groundes of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that we purpose not to speake of the righteousness of a worldly judiciale court, but of the heavenly judgement seat: that we should not measure by our owne small portion, by what vrightnesse of works Gods judgements may be satisfied. But it is maruellous to see with what rashnesse and boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be seene how none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteousness of works, than they that are either monstrosely sick of open outward diseases, or be ready to burst with inward vices. That commeth to passe because they thinke not upon the righteousness of God, whereas if they had sooner felt the little feeling, they would sooner make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect that nothing be imputed unto it but every way whole and absolutely, and declifed with no uncleanness: such as noer was and never shall be able to be found in man. It is indeed unsafe and ready for every man in Schooles to talke vainely upon the worthines of works to instruct men: But when they come into the sight of God, such dalliance must auoide, because there is earnest dooing vned, and no trifling strife about words. To this, to this I say, we must apply our mind, if we wil profitable enquire of true righteousnesse, how may we answer the heavenly judge where he calleth vs to account. Let vs thinke him to be a judge, not such a one as our owne understandings do of themelus imagine, but such a one as he is painted out in the scripture, with whose brightness the stars shall be darkned, by whose strength the hills do melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wife are taken in their subtletie, by whose purenes all things are prooued vntrue, whose righteousness the Angels are not able to bear, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pearcheth to the bottome of hell. If hee ( I faie ) fit to examine mens dooings, who shall appeare allured before his throne? who shall dwell with a deouer fire? faith the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings he that walketh in righteousnesse & speakest the truth, &c. But let such a one come foorth, whatsoeuer he be. But that answer maketh that none cometh foorth. For this terrible sayeing foundeth to the contrarie: Lorde if thou marke iniquities, Lord, who shall abide it? truly all must needs immediately perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be justified if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer then his maker? Beholde they that feene him are not faultfull, and he hath founde peruerfenesse in his Angels. How much more shall they that dwell in house of chaste and that have an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes? they shall be cut downe from the morning to the evening. Behold among his Saints there is none faultfull, and the heavens are not clean in his sight: howe much more is man abominable and unprofitable, which drinketh iniquity as water? I grant indeed that in the books of Job, as mention made of a righteousness that is higher than the keeping of the law. And it is good to understand this distinction: because although a man did satisfy the law, yet he could not so stand to the trial of that righteousness that passeth all fenses. Therefore although Job be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amazed, and not able to speake because he feeth that very angellike holmes cannot appease God, if he extely weigh their works. But I therefore will at this time outstrip that righteousness which I have spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than sensible: if so many curses wherewith the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, and among other this general curse, Cursed is every one that doth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shall be but vanity and cold, vnlike euerie man yield himselfe guiltie before the heauenly judge, and willingly throw downe and abase himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquitted.

2 To this, to this I say, we should have lifted vp our eies, to learn rather to tremble for feare, than vaine to rejoic. It is indeed easie, so long as the companion extendeth no further than men, for every man to thinke himselfe to have somewhat which other ought not to despise. But when we raise vp to have respect vnto God, then suddenly that confidence fallen to the ground and commeth to nought. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans bodie is in respect of the heauen. For the sight of the eie, so long as it continueth in viewing things that liue not to it, doth shew of what pearing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being dafeled and dulled with the too great brightness thereof, it feeth no leffe feeblenes of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perced no strength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let vs not deceive our selves with vaine confidence, although we count our selves either equal or superior to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose will this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildnes cannot be tamed with these admonitions, he will answer vs as he said to the Pharisees: you be they that justifie your selves before men: but that which is high to men is abominable to God. Now go thy way & proudly boast of thy righteousness among men, while God from heauen abhorreth it. But what say the seruants of God that are truly instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into judgement with thy seruant, because euerie living man shall not be justified in thy sight. Another faith, although in somewhat divers meaning: Man cannot be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answer one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousness of God, even such as can be satisfied with no worke of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thousand offences, we cannot purge our selves of one. Such righteousness had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceived, when he professed that he knew himselfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby justified.

3 And not only such examples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly writers do shew that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine faith, All the godly that groane under this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weaknesses of life have this onely hope that we have one Mediator Iesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our sines. What faith he? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it non, he leaveth none other. And Bernard faith, And indeed where is safe and stable rest and surenhes for the weak, but in the wounds of our Saviour? and so much the furer I dwell therein as he is mightier to finde. The world rageth, the bodie burdeneth, the dewe lighest, in waie: I fall not, because I am builded upon the sure rocke: I have finned a gratuitous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be ouettouled, because I shall remember the.

the woundes of the Lord. And hereupon afterward he concludeth, Therefore my merite is the Lords taking of mercy, I am not vitally without merite, so long as he is not without merites. But if the merites of the Lord be many, then I also have as many merites. Shall I sing mine owne righteousness? Lord I will remember onely thy righteousnesses. For that is also my righteousnesses, for he is made vnto me righteousnesses of God. Againe in an other place, This is the whole merite of man, if he put his whole hope in him that saueth whole man. Likewise where retaining peace to himselfe he leaueth the glory to God, To thee (faith he) let glory remaine uniminished: it shall be well with me, if I haue peace, I forswear glory altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne. I loose also that which is offered me. And more plainly in an other place hee faith: Why should the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer wyay to glory vpon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldst aske, by what merites we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophet, I will doe it, not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, faith the Lord. It sufficeth for merite, to know what merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presume of merites, so to be without merites sufficeth to judgement. Whereas he freely vseth this worde Merites for good workes, we must therein beare with the custome. But in the ende his purpose was to make hypocrites afraid, that wildly range with licenciousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himselfe, saying: Happy is the Church that neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. It haeth whereupon to presume, but not merites. It hath merites, but to deferre, not to presume. Is not the very not presuming a defcrue? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, having large matter to glory vpon, euen the many merites of the Lord.

4 This is the truth. The exercised consciences perceive this to be the onely sanctuarie of saftie, wherein the may safely rest themselves when they have to doe with the judgement of God. For if the Starres that seamed most bright in the night seasion, doe loose their brightnes, with sight of the Sunne, what thinke we shall be come euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shall be a most seuer examination, that shall pierce into the most hidden thoughtes of the hart, and (as Paul faith) shall reuell the secrets of darkenes, and disclofe the hidden things of the hart, which shall compell the lurking and vnwillinge conscience to vter all things that now are fallen out of remembrance. The dwell euell accuser will preffe vs, which is prudie to all the wicked deeds that he hath moued vs to doe. There the outward pomponous shewes of good workes which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profite vs. Onely the purenesse of will shall be required. Wherefore the hypocriste, not onely whereby every man knowing himselfe guilie before God desireth to boaste himselfe before men, but also whereby every man deuiceth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flattere our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoever it now be proude, with more than drunken boldnes. They that bend not their wit to such a fight, may indeede for a short time sweetly and pleasanfly frame a righteousnes to themselves, but it is such a righteousnes as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the judgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnes, shall certainly finde that all the workes of men, if they be judged by their owne worthines, are nothing but delusions and filthines: that that which among the common people is accounted righteousnes, is before God meere wickednes: that that which is judged purtie, is vnleannes: that that which is reckoned glorie, is but shame.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grievce vs to descend
Cap. 12. Of the manner how to receive

That partial and blinde affection which becaufe we bear unto our felues when we are our owne judges, maketh us fonde to imagine that such as we shall feme also when God judgeth us must be shaken off.

Zeph. 3. 11.

To looke upon our felues without flatterie or blinde affection of love. For it is no marueil if we be all so blind in this behalfe, forasmuch as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tenderness toward himfelfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs al. To every man (faith Solomon) his owne way is right in his owne eyes. Again. All the ways of man feme cleane in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquited by this blindnes? No, but (as he further faith in the fame place) the Lord weigheth the hearts, that is to fay, while man fattereth himfelfe by reafon of the outward visor or righteousness that he beareth in reftance, in the mean time the Lord with his balance examineth the hidden vncleneanes of the heart. Therefore fith we fo nothing proft with fuch flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our felues to our owne destruction. But that we may trie our felues rightlie, we must necelary call bacce our conscience to the judgement fcat of God. For we do aliogether neede his light to disclofe the fecret foldings of our perturberies, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then and never till then, we shall cleere ly perceive what is meant hereby: that man being rottenfalle and a worme, abominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednesse as water is far from being justifie before God. For who should make that cleane that is conceited of vncleneanes? not one man. Then fhall we alfo finde that by experience, which Iob faide of himfelfe? If I will goe about to shew my felle innocent, mine owne mouth fhall condemn me: If I will shew my felle rightlieous: it will proue me wicked. For that is not meane of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israel, that all went alwaye like sheepe, that every one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehended all them, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examination ought to proceed fo far, till it subdue vs, fo that we be fully thrown downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For he is deceived that thinketh himfelfe able to receiue the enjoying of this grace, vntill he have first thrown downe all hauines of minde. This is a knownefying: that God confoundeth the proud, and gueseth grace to the humble.

6 But what way is there to humble our felues, but that we being aliogether needie and emptie, should give place to the mercie of God? For I do not cal it humblenes, if we thinke that we have any thing remaining with vs. And hither they have taught a very hurtfull hypocrisy that have joyned these two things together, that we must thinke humble of our felues before God, and that we must make some account of our owne righteousnesse. For if we confesse to God contrary to our owne thinking, wee do wickedly lie vnto him: but we cannot thinke as we ought, but that by and by all that seemeth glorious in vs must betedron vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared salvation for the humble people, and abatement for the eyes of the wicked: If thinke, that there is no carriage open to salvation, vntill thou have had away all pride and taken to thee perfect humblenes: then, that the fame humblenes is not a certaine modestie whereby thou gueft over to the Lord a haue beade to thine owne right, as they are called humble before men that do neither presupptuously advance themfelles, nor re-prochfully triumph over other; although they stand vpon some estimate of their owne excellencie: but an vnfained submission of a minde thrown downe with feeding of his owne infenie and needineffe. For it is so enfore describ'd in the word of God. When the Lord faith thus in Zephaniah: I will take away out of thee him that outrageously rejoyceth, and I will leave in the mids of thee the afflicted man and the poore man, and they shall trust in the Lord; doth he not there plainely fhew who be humble? even they that he afflicted with knowledge of their owne pouretie. On the other side he calleth the proud, outrageous rejoycers, because men joyning in prosperousitie are wont to rejoice without measure. But to the humble whom he purpocheth to hate, hee leaueth nothing but to trust in the Lord. And likewife it is faide Therefore.

In [Esaie]: Whom shall I make to burn, but to the poor and contrite in spirit, and him that cleareth my words? Again: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternity, his name is holy, that dwelleth on high, and in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirit, to quicken the spirit of the humble and the heart of the contrite. When thou dost cleareth the name of contrition, understand thereby the wound of the heart, that suffereth not a man thrown down on the ground to rise again. With such contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of God be advanced with the humble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mightie hand of God to thy shame and disgrace.

7. And our best Schoolemaister thinking it not enough to shew it out in words, hath also set it out vs in a parable the image of true humility as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publicane that standing a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eyes to Heaven, with much knocking his breast, prayeth in this wise: Lord be merciful to me a sinner. Let vs not think there to be tokens of stained modestie, that he dare not looke vp to Heaven, nor to come neerer, that with knocking his breast he confesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs know that they be testimonies of inward affliction. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee which thanketh God that he is not of the common sort of men, either an oppressor, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fasted twice on the Sabboth, and gave tithes of all that he possessed. Hee doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousness which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he depareth from God unsavoured and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednes is justified. Hereby we may see, how great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the hart cannot be open to receive his mercy, vnlesse it be first void of all opinion of his owne worthines. When this opinion hath possett the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercy to enter. And that no man should doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his Father into the earth with this commision, to bring glad tidings to the poor, to heal the contrite in hart, to preach liberty to the captives, and deliverance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourn: to give them glory for althes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praise for the spirit of sorrow. According to this commision, he calleth none but them that labor and are laden to take part of his liberalitie. And in an other place he faith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8. Therefore if we will give place to the calling of Christ, let all arroganie and carelesenes depart far away from vs. Arroganie growth of a foolish perswation of our owne righteounes, when a man thinketh himselfe to have somewhat, as the defearing whereof he may be commended before God, carelesnes may be even without any perswation of works. For many sinners, because being dronke with fweetnes of vices they think not upon the judgement of God, as it were senselessly amazed with a diseale of drounines, that they aspire not to the mercy offered them. But we must no lesse flanke off such dull thinkings, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our felues, that we may without encombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empty and hungry may be filled with his good things. For we shall never sufficiently have trust in him, vnles we utterly distrust of our felues, we shall never sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first throwne downe in our felues. We shall never sufficiently have consolation in him, vnlesse we be first desolate in our selues. Therefore we be then meete to take hold of and obtain the favour of God, calling away all trust of our felues, but trusting upon the only assurednesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine faith) forgetting our owne descreunges, we embrace the gittes of Christ. Because if he sought descruinges in vs, we should not come to his gittes. Wherewith Bernard very well accordeth, comparing proud men to vnfaithfull servantes, that arrogantly claim any thing be it neuer so little to their own descruinges:
Cap. 13. Of the manner how to receive defering: because they do wrongfully keepe to themselves the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would say that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receieth through a window. But, not to rake longer hereupon, let vs take a short but a general and sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath utterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of righteousness, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteousness. Because every man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he resiteth in himselfe.

The xiiij. Chapter.
That there are two things to be marked in free justification.

And here are alwyes two things to be principally looked unto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lord his glory unmindered, and as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an untroubled quietnes and tranquillitie before his judgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to give owne to God a confession of praise, when we entreat of righteousness. And the Apostle teftifieth, that this was the Lords principall purpose of giving vs righteousness in Christ, that he might shew his owne righteousness. And what a shewing that should be, he declareth immediately after: that is, if he alone be known to be righteous, and that justified him that is of the faith of Iesus Christ. Thou seest that the righteousness of God is not sufficiently set out, vnlesse he alone be accounted righteous, & do communicate the grace of righteousness to them that defere it not. By this meanes he will have every mouth to be stopped, and the whole world to be made subject to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somwhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezekiel he teacheth how much we glorifie his name by reknowling of our owne wickednes. You shall remember (faith he) the waies and all the wicked doings whereby ye have beene defiled. And ye shall be displeased with your selues in your owne sight, in all the cuils that ye haue committed. And ye shall know that I am the Lorde, when I shall doe good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your owne wicked offfences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we being broofed with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then do we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lord any parcel be it never so small of the praise of his free goodness? Likewise Jeremie whch he crieth out. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorifieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare that somwhat is diminishe from Gods glory, if man glory in himselfe? To this purpose truly doth Paul apply those words, when he teacheth that all the parts of our salvation are repos'd in Christ, that wee should not glory but in the Lord. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darketh his glory, whooeuer thinketh that he hath any thing be it never so little of his owne.

What is it not to glory in our selues.
Rom. 2. 29.
Ezay 45. 25.
This is the truth, we never truely glory in him, vnlesse we be utterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that all they glory against God that glory in themselues. For Paul indigeth that only by this meanes the world is made subject to God, when all matter to glory upon is utterly taken from men. Therefore Ezay, when he declareth that Israel shall have their justification in God, faith also that they shall there also have their praise: as though he should say, that the Lord to this ende sufficeth the elect that they should glory in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be prais'd in the Lord, he hath taught in the vses next before: that is, that we should say we that our righteousness and strengthe are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed confirmed with an oath, that a man should not thinke that hee shall bee discharged with I want not what fained humilitie. And let no man heere allege for excuse that he doth not glory when without arrogancie heereknowledgeh his own righteousnes: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence not confidence but it breedeth glorie. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteousnes we must have regard to this end, that the praise thereof remaine with the Lorde whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declaration of his righteousnes (as the Apostle telliseth) he hath powred out his grace vpon vs, that he might be lust and justifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in another place, when hee had taught that the Lord gaue vs saluation, to set out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeating the same thing he addeth: ye are fained by grace, and by the gift of God, not by worke, that none should glory. And when Peter tellleth that we are called vnto hope of saluation that we should declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darknes into his maruellous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the one-ly praises of God to sound in the ears of the faithfull, that they should with deepesience oppresse all arrogancie of the fleth. In a sum, man cannot without robbere of God challenge to himselfe any one crum of righteousnes; because even so much is plucked and taken away from the glorie of Gods righteousnes.

3 Now if we aske by what meanes the conscience may be quieted before God, we shall finde no other meanes but if free righteousnes be given vs by the gift of God.
Let vs alway thinke vpon this saying of Salomon, Who shall say, I haue clensed my harte, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truely there is no man that shall not be ove-whelmed with infinite fithines. Therefore let euery perfect man descend into his owne conscience, and call his doings to account: what end shall he haue? Shall he sweetely rest as though all things were in good order betwene him and God and shall he not rather be vexed with terrible tormentes, when hee feele matter of damnation abiding in himselfe if he be judged according to his works? The conscience if it looke vpon God, must of necessitie either haue allured peace with his judgement, or be besieged with the terrorres of hell. Therefore we profite nothing in disputing of righ-teousnes vnlesse we establish such a righteousnes, with the steadfastnesse whereof our soule may be staid in the judgement of God. When our soule shall haue whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receive his judgement, vnhaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue founde an vnfained righteousnesse. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much vpon this point, with whose words I had rather expresse it than with mine owne. If (faith he) the promife of inheritance be off the law, faith is made voide, the promife is made abolished. He first inferreth that faith is disanulled and made voide if the promife of righteousnes have respect to the deffernings of our works, or do hang vpon the keeping of the law. For so could never any man affuredly rest in it: because it could never come to passe that any man might assuredly determine with himselfe that hee had satisfied the law, as indeed never any man doth by worke fullie fatisfiue it.
Whereof that we should not neede to feake farre for testimonies to produce it, crie man may be a witness to himselfe that will with a right eie behold himselfe. And hereby appeareth, in howe deepe and darke corners hypocrisy buryed the mindes of men, while they so carfully heare with themselves, that they sticke not to set their owne flatteries against the judgement of God, as though they would binde to false his judgment proceeding. But the faithfull that doe sincerely examine themselves, are grieved and tormented with a farre other manner of carefulnesse. Therefore there should so enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a very despaire where each man for himselfe should make account, with howe great a burden of debt he is still ouexpressed, & how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged, Lo, how faith is by this mean already expressed & extinguished. For to waue, to Dd 4 - varie,

Cap. 13. Of the manner how to receive.

varie, to be carried up and downe, to stick fast in doubting, to be holden in suspense, to stagger, and at length to despair, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy mind with constant certainty and perfect assurance, and to have whereupon to rest and fasten thy foot.

4. He adjoyneth also another thing, that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang upon our departing, when shall we come thus far as to secure the bountifulnes of God? Also this second point hangeth upon the former: For the promise shall not be fulfilled but to them that believe it. Therefore if faith be fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise. Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to establish the promise. For it is abundantly well established when it resteth upon the onlie mercie of God: because his mercie and truth are with a perpetuall knotyned together, that is to say, whatsoever God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So _David_ before that he required saluation by the word of God first determineth the cause thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (faith he) come vnto me, thy saluation according to thy word. And rightfully: because God is by no other meanes perswaded to make the promise but of his owne meere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten all our hope and not to looke to our owne works, to seeke any help of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake any new thing: _Augustine_ doth also teach that we ought so to do. Christ (faith he) shall reign forever in his seruants, God hath promiseth, God hath said it, and if that be not enough, God hath sworn it. Therefore so much as the promise is established, not according to our persuasions, but according to his mercy, no man ought to speake fearfully of that of which he can not doubt. _Bernard_ also faith: The disciples of Christ say, Who can be saue? But he answered, this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our onlie comfort, this is the whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibilitie, what saith we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of love or hated? Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath seen his counsellor? Here now faith must of necessitie help vs, here must his truest succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be revealed by the Spirite, and his Spirite testifying it may perswade our hearts, that we are the sons of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and justifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meanes passage from the sartneall predetermination to the glorie that is to come. Briefely let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not establishd, vnshe can be taken hold of with assured affiance of confidence: and wherefore there is any doubting or uncertainty, it pronouns that they be voide. Againe it pronoynceth that they do nothing but stagger and waire, if they rest upon our owne works. Therefore we must needs either loose righteounesse, or we must not consider our owne works, but only faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift vp her cares and shut her eyes, that is to say, to be heedfully bent to the promise only, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse orperswating. So is that notable prophesie of _Zacharie_ fulfilled, that when the wickednes of the land shall be done away, a man shall call his friend vnder his vine and under his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull do otherwise enjoy true peace but after obtaining of the forgiveness of sinnes. For this calulation is to be remembered in the Prophets, that when they speak of the kingdom of Christ, they set out the outward blessings of God as figures of the spiritual things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because he appeareth all the troublesome motions of confidence. If we seke by what meanes he doth it, we must needs come to the sacrifie by which God is appeare. For he shall never cease to tremble for fear that shall not determine that God is appeare by the

But why do we so darke a testimonie? Paul every where denieth that there is peace or quiet joy left to confciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be justified by faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that assured issuance commeth, namely when the loue of God is poured into our hearts by the holy Ghost: as if he had said, that our confciences cannot otherwise be quieted, vnlesse we be certainly persuaded that we please God. Whereupon also in another place he exclaimeth out in the person of all the godlie, Who shall fcrue vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because we shall tremble even at every little breath, till we be arrived into the haven: but we shall be without care even in the darkness of death, so long as the Lord shall shew himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoever prate that we are justified by faith, because being regenerate we are in the looke of our life, they are neuer tasted of the sweetness of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull unto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks and whatsouer other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witts) it is no true faith vnlesse it teach and put vs in mind of that most sweene name of Father, yea vnlesse it opent our mouth freely to cry out Abba Father: Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he faith that in Christ we haue boldnes and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truely this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is always vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in itselfe manifold matter of doubting. Wherefore we must of necessitye come to this remedie, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, but because being graffed into the body of Christ, they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching iustification, faith is a thing meere passiu, bringing nothing of our owne to the recovering of the favour of God, but receiving of Christ that which we want.

The xiiiij. Chapter.
What is the beginning of iustification, and the continuall proceedings thereof.

That the matter may be made more plaine, let vs search, what may be the righteousnesse of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned inindolatry: or being entred into profession by sacraments, denying God with vncleanesse of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Chriiftes no further than in name: or they be hypocrites, which cover the wickednesse of their hearts, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirit of God, they endeavour themselves to truely holiness. Specially when they are to be judged by their natural gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be found one spark of goodness, vnlesse peraduenture we will accuse the Scripture of falsehood, when it seteth out all the sons of Adam with these titles that they be of froward and stubborn heart, that all the imagination of their heart is cull from their infancy, that their thoughts be vaine, that they have not the fear of God before their eyes, that none of them understandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be fleshy, by which word are understood all those works which Paul calleth fleshe, fornication, vncleanesse, vnicertainesse, riotousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witcherias, enmitie, contenctions, calumnyes, anger, dilufions, [etces, envyes, man-slaughters, & whatsoever filthineesse and abomination may be denieth. This fleshy is the worstinesse, with confidence whereof they must be proued. But if any among them excell with such honestie of manners as may have some shew of holinesse among men: yet because we know knowe that God regardeth not the outward glistening, we must search the very fountain of works if we will have them to auail any thing to righteousness. We must (I say) thoroughly looke into them, from what affection of hart these works proceed. But although here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very few wordes, I will follow as much as I may a briefeneffe in teaching.

2. Firft I deny not that whatsoever excellent gifts appeare in the vnbelieuers, they are the gifts of God. Neither doe I so differ from common judgement, that I would affirm that there is no difference betwene the justice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Traiana, and the rage, intemperance, and cruelty of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betwene the filthie lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Vespasian: and (that we may nottarry upon some speciall vertues or vices) betwene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth euen in the dead image thereof. For what thing shall there remaine well ordered in the world, if we confound these together? Therefore such a difference betwene honest and vnhotest doings, the Lorde hath not onely engrauen in the minde of all men, but also doth oft confirm it with the dispensation of his providence. For we see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men doe follow vertue. Not because that outward image of vertue deterueth so much as the least benefite of his: but so it pleaseth him to declare by proofe how much true righteousnesse pleaseth him, when he sufferers euen outward and fained righteousnesse not to be without rewardes. Whereupon followeth that which we euen now confessed, that these vertues such as they are, or rather images of vertues are the gifts of God, for as much as there is nothing in any wise praise worthie, which proceedeth not from him.

3. But neuerthelie, it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are strangers from the true religion of the one God, howsoever they be accounted woorthie of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely woorthie of no reward, but rather are woorthie of punishment, because they doe with desiling of their hart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instrumens of God to preface the fellowship of men with justice, continencie, temperance of minde, valiantinesse, and wisedome: yet they doe very euilly execute these good works of God: because they are restrained from euill doing, not by sincerely loue of goodnesse, but either by onely ambition, or by loue of themselues, or by some other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the very vncleneffe of hart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, than those vices which are woont to deceie by reafon of neereneffe and likeneffe of vertue. Finally when we remember, that the end of that which is right, euer is that God be seru'd: whatsoever tendeth to any other end, soothwith worthily lootheth the name of right. Because therefore they have not respect to the marke which the wisdome of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongfull end it is sinne. He concludes therefore that all the Fabricy, Scipiones, and Catores, in all those excellent actes of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the ende to which they ought to have applied them: and that for that cause true righteousnesse was not in them: for as much as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the ends.

4. Moreover if it be true which John faith, that there is no life without the sone of God: who so have no part in Christ, what manner of men soever they be, whatsoever they doe or go about, yet they run forward with their whole course into destruction and the judgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that said of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the vunrighteous, not by lawe of works: but by the very lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good works are turned into sinners. Wherefore the same Augustine saith very well in another place, when he compareth the endeavours of such men to running out of the way. For how much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the mark, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is certain that they are evil trees, forasmuch as without the communication of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruits and beaumiful to the eye, yea and sweetes in taffe, but in no wise good fruits. Hereby we easily perceive that whatsoever man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not only of no value to righteousness, but of certaine deferuing to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doubfull thing, Sith it is already proved by the witness of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God without faith?

5 But there shall at length appeare a plainer proofe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the natural state of man. For the Scripture crieth out every where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be provoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodness preuenceth him. For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when he lighteth vs with the knowledge of himselfe, he is said to raise vs from death, and to make vs a new creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodness of God is set forth vnto vs by this title, God (saith he) which is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loued vs, even when we were dead by sinnes, hath made vs alive together in Christ, &c. In another place, where under the title of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, he faith: it is God that giveth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly entreateth downe this arrogancie, in the historie of Job, in these words: who preuenteth me, and I shall render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding applyeth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lord but mere shame of neediness and emptinesse. Wherefore in the place above cited, to prove that we are come into the hope of salvation by his grace alone, not by works, he allegateh that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Jesus, to the good works which he hath prepared, that we should walke in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his righteousness provoked God, Sith our first power to do good proceeded out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, why should sooner be wronged out of a stone, than a good workes out of vs. Truly it is wonderful if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindness & love of God our favour towards vs hath appeared, because he hath sauen vs, not by the works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his owne mercie: that being justified by his grace, we might be made the heirs of eternall life. By this confession we dispoise man of all righteousness eu to the least little piece thereof, till he be by only mercie regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousness of works do bring any thing toward the justifying of vs, it is falsely said that we are justified by grace. Truly the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed justification to be of free gift, which in another place calleth that grace is now not grace, if works do any thing auable. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he saith, that he came not to call righteous men, but sinners? If only sinners are received, why seeketh he an entrie by fained righteousnesse? God unfaught vs, why should vs seeketh as of more love, and doth not require such.

The second and third sort of men mentioned Sect. 1. having not faith, cannot have righteousness such as Christ fasteth them to use.

such as unless be most strictly thrust out of place, it never yeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to tarry somewhat the longer upon it. Yet forasmuch as the Scripture is clear enough in this matter, I will in the tender rather use the words thereof than mine owne. For, when he hath described the utter fall of mankind, doth immediately after very ftdy adioine the order of restoring. The Lord hath scene, and it seemed euill in his eyes. And he say that there is no man: and he maruellied that there is none that offereth himselfe: and he hath for salvation in his owne armes, and hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousness. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet saith: That there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recovering his salvation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discounting of the reconciling of sinners to himselfe, faith: I will espouse thee to me for ever, in righteousness, judgement, grace and mercy. I will say to her that hath not obtained mercy, thou hast obtained mercie. If such a covenant, which it is certaine to be the first conioyning that we have with God, standeth upon the mercy of God, there is left no foundation of our own righteousness. And I would faine learne of those men which faine that man meteth God with some righteousness of works, whether they think that there is any righteousness at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madness to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceed from his enemies, whom he wholly abhorreth with all their doings? That all we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it felse itself, till being justified, we are received into friendship. If justification be the beginning of loue, what righteousness of works shall goe before it? So John to turn away that pestilent arroganie, doth diligently put in mind how we did not first loue him. And the felse same thing the Lord had long before taught by his Prophet: I will loue them faith he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loie is not prouoked by works: if it hath of his owne accord inclined itselfe vnto vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing else, but that no man hath deserued that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entire in the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our own works. Yea, but howsoever we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father grafted into the communion of him, we are both heires of darkenenes and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth that we are not cleansed and wafted from our uncleannesse by the blood of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirit is auleth vs into obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ. If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the blood of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner is without Christ: Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our salvation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life; Because when for Christes sake it is given to vs to beleue in him, then we first begin to passe from death into life.

7. Under this sort are comprehended they which have in the division above for beene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncompass of confidence prooueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this prooueth the want of Faith. Whereby appereth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet justified in his sight: for as much as these good things are not attained to, but by Faith. What can sinners being estranged from God bring forth, but that which is accuses in his judgement? With this foolish boldenes in deed, both all wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrites, because howsoever they know that their whole hart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they doe any works that have a strow of goodnes, they thinke them worthy that God should not despise them. Hereof growth that pernicious error, that being proved guilty of a wicked & mischieuous mind, yet they cannot be driven to confess themselves void of righteousnesse: but even when they acknowledge themselves unrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claim some righteousness into them. This vanity the Lord excellently well confute by the Prophet, Ask (saith he) the prieftes, saying: if a man carie sanctified flesh in the hem of his garment, and putteth to it bread or other meate, shall it be sanctified? The prieftes answered: No. And Haggai saith, If a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be desiled? The prieftes answered, it shall be desiled. Hag.2,12.

8. The same matter he excellently well handleth in Esaie, Offer not (saith he) sacrifice in vain: incense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calends & solemnities. They are become tedious to me, and I haue beene wearie with bearing them: when you shall hold vp your hands I will turne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply prayer I will not heare: for your hands are full of bloud. Be washed, be cleane, take away the cull of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so loatheth the obeying of his own law? Yea, but he here refuseth nothing that is of the natural observance of the law, the beginning whereof hee every where teacheth to be the unfaied feare of his name. That is, when he is shewen, whatsoever things are offered him are not onely trufles, but stinking and abominaable filthines. Now let the hypocrisies go, and keeping pervertines wrapped vp in their hart, endeavour to defeute the favour of God with works. But by this meanes, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of the wicked are abominable, and the onlie prayer of vpright men pleath him. Therefore wee holde that out of doubt, which ought to be most commonly known to him, that is even but meanly exercised in the Scriptures, that euym those works that glister most gloriously in men not yet truely sanctified, are so farre from rightoufnesse in the light of the Lord, that they be judged sins. And therefore they haue said most truly that haue taught that favoure with God is not procured to any person by works: but contrariwise that works do then please, & never till then, when the person hath first found grace in the light of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hande. Mofes Gen.4,4. wraueth that the Lord had respect to Abel & to his works. See you not how he declareth that God is favourables to the men, before that hee hath respect to their works? Wherefore the cleansing of the hart must goe before, that the works which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God, because this laying of Jeremie is alway in force, that the works of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is onely faith by which the hartes of men are cleene, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and louely faith.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousness they have, whom wee haue set in the fourth degree. We grant that when God by the meanes of the righteousness of Christ, reconcileth vs to himselfe, and giving vs free forgiveness of sinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercy is also cojoined that his beneficial doing, that by his holy Spirit he dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the lusts of our flesh are daile more and more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lord unto true purenesse of life, when our harts are framed to the obedience of the law: that this may be our chiefe will, to serue his will, and by all means to advance onely his glo-rie. But even while by the guiding of the holy Ghost wee walke in the wares of the Lorde, leaft we yet forgettynge our selues should waxe proud, there are left certaine remnants of imperfection, which may minifter vs matter of humiliation. There is none righteous, (faith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What maner of righteousnes therefore will they yet get by their worke? First, I say, that the best worke that can be brought forthe of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some vnkleanne of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregs mingled with it. I say, let a holy servant of God choose of all his life the most excellent thing that hee shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the parts of it, without doubt hee shall finde somewhere somewhat favouring of the rottennesse of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well our cheerefull quickenenesse is never such as it ought to be, but in slacking our course our weaknesses is much. Although we see that there are evident foule blots wherewith the works of the holy are blemished, yet graunt that they be nothing but most little spots: shall they nothing offende the eies of God, before whom even the stars are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be judged in it selfe, defraueth not just reward of fame.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible that we should haue some thoroughlie pure and perfect worke, yet one sinne is enough to blot out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousness, as the Prophet saith, With whom also James agreeth: He that offendeth (faith he) in one, is made guiltie of all. Now with this mortall life is never pure or void from sin, whatsoever righteousness we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it should not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousness. Finally when the righteousness of worke be entreated of, we must not have respect to the worke of the law, but to the commandement. Therefore if we seeke righteousness by the lawe, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two works: but a perpetuall obedience of the law is there necessarie. Wherefore the Lord doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs for righteousness that same forgiveness of sins whereof we have spoken, that having once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterwards seeke righteousness in the law, because he should do nothing els but bring vs into a fals hope, & mocke and laugh vs to death. For if no perfection could come to vs so long as we are cloathed with this flesh, and fis the lawe threateneth death and judgement to all them that performe not full righteousness in worke: it shall alway haue whereof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercie of God on the other side did withstanding it, to acquire vs from time to time with continuall forgiveness of sins. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we said at the beginning, that if we be weighed by our owne worthines, whatsoever we purpose or go about, yet we with all our travailes and endeours are worthie of death and defitution.

11 Upon these two points we must stronly stand fast: that there was neuer any work of a godlie man, which if it were examined by the seueres judgment of God, was not damnable. Againe, if there be any such shewed, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sins, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is louted, it loogeth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation.
For about the beginning of justification there is no strife betwenee us and the sounder sort of Schoolemen, but that a sinner being freely deliuetered from damnation ob-taineth righteousness, and that by the forgiveness of sinnes: sayling that they under the word of justification comprehend the renewing wherewith we are newly formed by the spirit of God into the obedience of the lawe, and they thus describe the righteousness of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good works judged righteous before God, and by their desirings is accepted. But the Lord contrariwise pronounceth that he imputer to Abraham faith for righteousness, not at the time when he yet serued idols, but when he had already many yeeres excelled in holiness of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure hart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousness repose in faith. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of works. Likewise when it is saide in the Prophet: The righteous man shall live by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophanemen, whom the Lord justifieth by converting them to the faith, but the speech is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentencce, he tak-eth this verse of David: Blessed are they whole iniquities are forgiven. But it is certaine, that David speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: beace he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednes we must not have once in our life, but hold it throughout al our life. Laft of al he tefti-fieth that the embassage concerning the free recockilation with God is not published for one or two daies, but is perpetuall in the Church. Therefore the faithfull have euen to the end of their life no other righteousness than that which is there set forth.
For Christ everlastingly remainth the Mediatour to reconcile the father to vs, and the effectuallie of his death is everlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewith our iniquities are covered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we haue the beginning of salvation out of grace, but that we are saved by grace, not of works, that no man shoulde glorie.

12 The starting holes which the Schoolemen doe here seek to escape by, doe not deliver them. They say that good works are not by inward worthinesse in themselves of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteousness, but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they are diuert conaffe that the righteousness of works is in this life alwaies imperfect, they grant that we, so long as we live, doe neede forgiveness of sinnes, whereby the want of works may be supplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompenséd with works of supererogation. For I answere, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodness whereby the father embrace us in Christ, when he clothe us with the innocence of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficiall meane thereof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousness of Christ (which it onely is perfect, so onely can abide the sight of God) must be set in our stead, and be presented at the barre as a suretie. Herewith we being furnish'd, doe obtaine continuall forgiveness of sinnes in faith. With the perfection hereof our filthinesse and veniallness of imperfections being cover'd are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the judgement of God, vntill the hower come, when the olde man being flame and utterly destroied in vs, the goodnes of God shall receive vs into blessed peace with the new Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lord in which in reuenging in cortumt bodies, we shall be remoued into the glorie of the heavenlyl kingdom.

13 If these things be true, verily no works of ours can of themselves make vs acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the works themselves please, but in respect that man being cover'd with the righteousness of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth
Cap. 14. Of the manner how to receive obtaineth forgivenes of his finnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternall life to some certaine works, but onely pronounseth that he which doth these things shall live: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things.

Whereby the dueise of righteousnesse in part is largely confusd, Sith no other righteousnesse is admitted into heaven, but a whole obseruing of the lawe. And no whit founder is that which they are wont to babble of suppyling of recompence by works of Supererogation. For why? Do they not still returne to the same place from whence they are alreadie shut out: that he which keepeth the law in part, is by works to fare righteous? That which no man of sound judgement will graunt them, they doe too shamefully take for confessed. So oft the Lord teacheth that he acknowledgeth no righteousnesse of works, but in the perfect obseruing of his lawe. What obstinacie is it, that we when we are destitute of that obseruing, least we should seeme spoyle of all glorie, that is, to have altogether givne place to God, doe boaste our felues of wot not what small peces of a few works, and go about by satisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions have already before been sufficiently overthrown, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Onely this lay, that they which so play the fools, doe not wyse how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truly they should understand that the whole righteousnes of men being laid vpon a heape, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we fee that man was by one offence fo cast away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall lost all meanes to recover saluation. Therefore the power of satisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themselves, but there shall never satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purposeth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be covered and forgiven, before that the Lord haue respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgivenesse of sinnes is of free grace which they doe wickedly blampheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostile, forgetting those things that are behindes vs, and hastning forward to those things that are before vs, run in our race endeuouring to the price of the high calling.

14. But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we have done all things that are commanded vs, we should say that we are vnprofitable servants, & that we have don no more than we ought? To lay before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy felowe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commanded vs vnfainedly to thinke and consider with our felues, that we doe not any free beneficall doings to him, but to render due service. And worthily. For we are servants indented in so many services, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts and all our memers, were turned into dutifull deedes of the law. And therefore that which he faith, When ye have done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if the rightuousnesse of one man were more than all the righteousnesse of men. How therefore may wee (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bold as to boaste that we have added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception and say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeoure may proceede beyonde necessarie duties, which in some behalfe causeth those that be from necessarie. For this we must altogether hold, that we can imagine nothing that saileth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not comprehended vnder the lawe of God. If it be a part of the lawe, let vs not boaste of voluntarie liberaltie, where we are bound to necessarie.

15. And for this purpose that glorying of Paulis out of seacon alleged: That among the Corinthians he did of his owne wil yeeld of his right, which otherwise he might haue vied if he had woulde, and that he hath employed vpon them not onely so much as he ought of dutie, but also haue given them his free trauell beyonde the bounds of duties. But they should have marked the reason there expressed, that he did this lest he should be an offence to the weak. For false and deceitfull works, men did boast themselves with this alluring shew of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure favour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospell, so that Paul was driuen of necessitie either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may fraine it, than I grant that the Apostle did something of supererogation for the Lorde. But if this were by right required of a wife distributor of the Gospell, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to doe. Finally, although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alwaie true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper postitions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the law to be due to their Lorde. And Christ hath vtttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thankes we will give to a bond-servant when having been all the day travailed with sundry labors he returneth home to vs in the evening. But it is possible, that hee hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst have required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for he with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogations are which these men will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as he neither hath at any time commanded, nor doth approove them, nor will allow them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onelie we will grant that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place spoken of these things: Wherefore do ye weye your siluer and not in bread? Ye spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is in deede not verie hard for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadowe in a soft chair: but when the soueraine judge shall sit in his judgement seat, such windie decrees shal of necessitie vanish away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence we may bring to his judgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two prelubes to bee driuen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnes of works. And that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The Scriptures do everywhere thus direct vs from all manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteousnesses do stinke in the sight of God, vndele they receive no favour from the innocencie of Christ, and that they do nothing but provoke the vengeancel of God, vndele they be suffetned by the tender- nesse of his mercy. Moreover they do leave nothing to vs, but that wee should e crave the mercy of our judge with that confession of David, that none shall be justified before him, if he require account of his servants. But where Job faith: If I have done wickedly, woe to me: but if I do righteously, yet will I not so lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteousnes of God, whereunto the very Angels antwere not: yet he therewithall theweth that when they come to the judgement of God, there remauneth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not onely to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld in dangerously struie with the rigourousnes of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteousnesse in himselfe, than such as at the first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen away, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can give the praise of righteousness to these works, the affiance whereof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whither Psalme calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may bee praised and glory in God: because it is most true which he faith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightlie be purified, when it shall neither in anie behalfe repone upon the confidence of works, nor rejoice in the glory of them. But this errorre encouraged foolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in works.

17 But if we looke to the foure kinds of causes, which the Philosophers teach us to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accord with works in the stablising of our saluation. For the scripture doth euerie where report, that the cause of procuring the eternall life to vs, is the mercie of the heauenly Father and his free love towards vs: that mannerall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which he purchased righteoufnesse for vs. What also shall we say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes John comprehended together in one sentence, when he faith. God so loved the world, that he gave his one ly begotten sonne, that euerie one which believeth in him may not perish, but may have everlasting life. Nowe the small cause the Apostle refueth to bee both the shewing of the righteoufnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where he rehearseth also the other three in expresse wordes. For he faith thus to the Romans: all have sinned and doo neede the glorie of God: but they are justified freely by his grace. Here thou hast the head and first fountaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercy. Then foloweth: by the redemption which is in Christ Iefu. Here thou hast as it were the matter whereof righteouines is made for vs through faith in his blood. Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteoufnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all he joyneth the ende, when he faith, unto the shewing of his righteoufnesse that he may be righteous and the righteousmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the wyse that this righteoufnesse standeth of reconciliation) he feteth expressly by name, that Christ was gien to vs for reconciliation. So in the first chapter alfo to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are received of God into favour by meere mercie: that the fame is wrought, by the interceffion of Christ: received by faith: all to this ende, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we see that all the partes of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that we should now either haue affiance or glorie in works? Neither can euens the most wyse enemies of the grace of God moue any controuerse with vs about the efficient or small cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiaall and formall cause they caste a false colour, as though our works have a halie place with faith & the righteouines of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture cryinge out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to vs for righteouines and life, and that this benefit of righteouines is possesse by onely faith.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftimes strenthen and comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and uprighenesse, and sometime also forbear not to report of it with praiie, that is done to two waryes: either that in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceive thereby aspired trufl of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteoufnesse, as for the just and deferved condemning of their aduersaries: or that euerywithout comparison other, while they record themselves before God, the purenesse of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two waryes, we shall see hereafter: Now let vs briefly declare of the latter, how it agree with that which we haue aboute, that in the judgement of God wee must rest upon no affiance of works, and glorie upon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding & stablising of their saluation, do without respect of workees bend their eyes to the onely goodnesse of God. And they do not onely bend themselves to it afore all things as to the beginning of blessednesse, but doe rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablised, is also stablised with consideration of workees: namely so farre as they are the winneings of God dwelling and reigneing in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of workees hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first call the whole.
affiance of thy minde vpon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrary to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclude the affiance of worke, we meane only this that a Christian minde may not bow to the merit of worke as to the succour of saluation, but should throughly rest in the free promise of righteousnes. But we forbid it not vnderprop & strengthen this faith with the signes of the good wil of God toward it selfe. For if all the good giues which God hath bestowed vpon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine manner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we are enlightened to behold that soueraine light of goodnes: much more is the grace of good worke, which sheweth that the Spirite of adoption is giuen vs.

11 When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their Faith, and gather matter of rejoicing, they doe nothing, but call to minde by the fruite of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore is that taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is fasted affuredness: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they have walked before his face in uprighness and simplicitie: have no place in laying the foundation of establishinge of conscience: but are then only of value, if they be taken of the enuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may establish a full affuredness, and the holy ones are private in their conscience of such an uprighness, wherewith are yet mingled many remanences of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the fruite of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they doe thereby not feuerly strengthen themselves to looke for the helpe of God in all their necessitie, when they by experience finde them their Fathers in so great a matter. And even this also they cannot doe, vnslee they have not conceited the goodness of God, sealed with no other affuredness, than of the promise. For if they begin to wey it by good works, nothing shal be more uncertaine nor more weake: forasmuch as if works be considered by themselves, they shall not be by their impecunio the prooffe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoever imperfect puritie tachifie his good wil. Finally they doe so set out the beneftes of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul teftifieth that there is the length, breadth, deepth, and height of them: as he should say: Whither focuer the sentences of the godly doe turne themselves, how high focuer they climb, how farre and wide focuer they extend them, yet they ought not to goe out of the loue of Christ, but hold themselves wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kinde of measures in it. And therefore he faith that it excellith and surmounteth aboue all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnes of God. As in another place, wher he glorifieth that all the godly are vanquishers in battell, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

20 We see now that there is not in the holy ones that affiance of worke, which either gueeth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the giues of God, whereby they reknowledged his goodness none otherwisse than assignes of their calling, whereby they may thinke upon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from the free righteousness which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in fewe words, but very well set out where he writeth, I do not say to the Lord, despite not the works of my hands, or I have sought the Lord with my handes and have not beene deceived. But I doe not commend the works of my handes: for I feare, least when thou hast looked vpon them, thou shalt finde more sins than Merites. Only this I say, this I ask, this I desire, despite not the works of thy handes, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest me: if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoever good worke I haue heau, they are of thee. He setteth two caufes, why he daire not boast of his works to God, because if he have any good works, he feeth therein nothing his owne: secondly, because the fame is also overwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Whereupon cometh to passe that the confidence feeth thereby more feare and dismaying then assurednes. Therefore he would haue God no other wife to looke on his well doings, than that reknowing in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the worke which he hath begun.

In what sense the good which we do, is learned a caufe of that good which God doth unto vs.

Rom. 8. 30.

Rom. 6. 13.

21 But furthermore whereas the scripture sheweth that the good worke of the faithfull, are caufes why the Lord doth good to them, that is so to be understood, that that which we haue before fet may stand unthaken, that the effect of our saluation consisteth in the love of God the Fater: the matter, in the obedience of the Son: the instrument, in the enlightening of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the end is the glorie of the so great kindness of God. These things withfaint and not, but that the Lord may embrace works as inferiour caufes. But whence commeth that? Namely whom the Lord of his mercy hath appointed to the inheritance of eternal life, them with his ordinary dispensation he doth by good works bring into the pretention thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this maner he sometime deriyeth eternal life from works: not for that it is to be ascribbed to them: but because whom he hath chosen, them he doth justifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step toward that which followeth, after a certain maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, he biddeth vs not to flee to works, but holdeth vs in the only thinking vpon the mercy of God. For what maner of thing is this which he teacheareth the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life everlasting? Why doth he not fet righteousness in comparision against sin, as he setteth life against death? Why doth he not make righteousness the cause of life, as he maketh sin the cause of death? For so should the comparision of contraries haue stand well together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meant by this comparision to expressse that which was trueth, that death is due to the deseruings of men: that life is repoed in the only mercy of God. Finally in these maners of speaking is rather expresed the order then the cause: because God in heaping graces vpon graces, taketh cause of the first to ad the second, that he may leaue nothing undone to the enriching of his servants: and he so continually extendeneth his liberalitie, that yet he would have vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountain and beginning of it. For although he loueth the gifts which he daily giueth, in so much as they spring out of that fountain: yet it is our part to hold fast that free acceptance, which alone is able to uphold our soules: as for such gifts of his Spirit as he afterward giueth vs, to so adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

The xv. Chapter.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merits of worke, doe overthrow as well the proue of God in gaining of righteousness, as also the assurednesse of salvation.

Whether worke thoust not as justifying may not withstand merite. which seem to give to works some merite in the sight of God: as though the justif-ication of \textit{ works} were fully wonne, if it be once proued that they be of any value with God. But we have abowe plainly shewed that the right enough of works consisteth only in the perfect keeping of the Law. Whereupon followeth that no man is justified by works, but he that haung climbed vp to the highest top of perfection cannot be proued guilty of any offence be it never so little. Therefore it is another and a severall question: How factor\textit{ works} suffice not to justify a man, whether yet doe they not deserve favor with God?

2 First of the name of Merite I must needs lay this afores hand, that who soever first applied it to works of men compared to the judgement of God, he did very ill provide for the purenes of Faith. Truely I doe by my good will abstaine from fruie about wordes, but I would that this sobietye had alway beene vfe among Christian writers, that they would not haue found in their harts to vie words strange from the Scriptures, which ingendered much offence and no fruite. For whereeto, I beseech you, was it needesfull to haue the name of Merite brought in, when the pric of good works might be fittly expresed by another name without offence? But how much offence that word containeth in it, is evident with the great hurt of the world. Surely as it is most proud e it doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with sour pride. The old writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vfe it, and I would to God they had not with the abusing of one little word gien to posteritie matter of error. Howbeit they themselves also doe in many places estifie, how in no cafe they meant to give any prejudice against the truth. For thus faith \textit{Augustine} in one place. Let Merites of Men here hold their peace, which have perished by \textit{Adam:} and let the grace of Godaigne, by Iesus Christ. Againse, the Saints gue nothing to their owne \textit{ Merites:} they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place, When man seeth that whatsoever good he hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, he seeth that all that is praised in him, is not of his owne \textit{ Merites,} but of the mercy of God. You see how taking from men the power of doing well, he also throweth downe the dignite of Merite. And \textit{chrysfotome} faith, Our works, if there be any, which follow the free calling of God, are repayment and debt: but the gifts of God are grace and bountifulnes and the greatness of liberall giving. But leaving the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing I have verily before alleaged a sentence out of \textit{Bernard.} As is sufficeth to merite, not to presume of \textit{ Merites:} so to want Merites, sufficeth to judgement. But by adding fouth with an expostition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnes of the word, where he faith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou haft them, know that they are gien hope for fruite, the mercy of God: and so thou haft escaped all danger, of pouerity, unthankfulnes, and presumption. Happy is the Church which neither wanteth merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. And a little before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning he vfe. For of Merites (faith he) why should the Church be carefull, which hath a ftedfaster and surer cause to glory of the purpose of God? God cannot deny himselfe, he will doe that which he hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldest ask, by what Merites may we hope for good things? specially fis thou hearest it said, Not for your fakes, but for my fakes: it sufficeth to Merite, to know that Merites suffice not.

3 What all our \textit{ works} deuere, the Scripture sheweth when it faith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of vnicleanesse: then, what the perfect observance of the law (if any such could be found) that deuere, when it teacheth that we shoulde think our infelues vnprouitable servants, when we have done all things that are commaunded vs? because we shal have gien nothing freely to the Lord, but onely have performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good \textit{ works} which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lord both calleth

Testimonies abused for proofe of merites, whereas the doctrine of scripture doth declare the cleave contrarie, that our good works dose deserve nothing at the hands of God, either in this life or in the hereafter. Eccle. 16. 14. Hebr. 13. 6.

Cap. 15. Of the maner how to receiue good works last well and acceptable to men.

ours and testifie, that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shall have reward. It is our duty againe for our part, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather up our hearts, that we be not wearied with well doing, and to yeeld true thankfulness to so great bountifull act of God. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoever there is in works that deserve praise: that there is not one droppe, which we ought properly to ascribe to our felow. This if we doe truely and earnestly acknowledge, there vallith away not onely all affiance but also opinion of Merite. We (I say) doe not parte the praise of good works (as the Sophisters doe) betweene God and man: but we referre it whole, perfect, and unminished to the Lord. Only this wee assigne to man, that euen the selfe same works that were good hee by his vncleanesse corrupted and defiled. For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect soever hee bee, that is not defiled with some spotte. Therefore, let the Lorde call into judgement euen these things that are best in the workes of men: hee shall verily eftie in them. his own righteousnesse, but mans dishoneste and shame. Good workes therefore doe please God and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for reward the most large benefits of God: not because they doe deserve, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price vnto them. But what filthieenes is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giueth vndue rewards to workes that deserves no such thing, doe with ambition full of sacriledge endeavour further, that that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to bee rendered to the merites of men. Here I appeale to the common judgement of every man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of grounde by another mans liberal grant, do also claime to him selfe the title of proprietie dothe not by such vnthankfulnesse deserve to loose the verie selfe possission which he had? Likewise, if a bondflawe being made free of his Lord, doe hide the barenes of the estate of a Libertine, and boast him selfe to be a free man borne: is he not worthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vs of enjoying a benefit, if we neither claime to our shutes more than is given, nor doe defraude the author of the benefit of his praise: but rather do so behave our felowes, that that which he hath gien from himselfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine maner to remayne with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what maner of moderation is due to God.

4 I know that the Sophisters doe abuse certaine places, to proove thereby that name of Merite toward God is found in the Scriptures. They allege a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Merite shall make place to every man, according to the Merite of his workes. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in refuting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully allege that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoever writer ye were, hath written. For the Greek copie is thus: πιθανον ελευθερων ποιητες πεπη, εγχειρετο καθε το εργον ανουσων ευποριας. He shall make place to every mercy, and every man shall finde according to his workes. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these words, and by a longer signifying so as to the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrues, there is no cause why they should spare vs in one little worde, when in the Greek worde of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices dulpicate and are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue and beate downe the outragiousnesse of our pride, that we faine not any worthines to workes beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good workes are continually beprinckled with many filthie spots, wherewith God may be worthily offended & be angry with vs: so far is it off, that they be able to win him to vs, or to provoke his.
his liberalitie toward vs: Yet because he of his tender kindnesse doth not examine them by extremitie of lawe, he taketh them as if they were most pure, and therefore though without merite, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life and of the life to come. For I doe not allowe the distinction set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good works deserve the graces that are giuen vs in this life, & that eternall life is the reward of faith alone. For the Lord doth commonly alwaies set in heaven the reward of labours and the crowne of battell. Against, to give it to the merite of works, that it be taken away from grace, that the Lord heareth vs with graces upon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ faith that to him that hath, thou shalt bee giuen, and that the faithfull and good servant which hath shewed himself faithfull in fewe things, shall bee set over many: yet he also sheweth in another place, that the encreases of the faithfull are the gifts of his free goodnes. All yee that thirst faith come to the waters: and yee that have not, come and buy milke and hony without money & without any exchange. Whatsoever therefore is now giuen to the faithfull for helpe of salvation, yea and bleffednes it self, is the meer liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in thole he testifieth that he hath consideration of works: because to refiect the greatnesse of his loue toward vs, he vouchfaeth to grant such honour not onely to vs, but also to the gifts which he had giuen vs.

5 If these things had in the ages past beene handled and disposed in such order as they ought to have beene, there had never risen so many troubles and dissensions. Paul faith that in the building of Christian doctrine, we must keepe full that foundation which he had laid among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be laide: and that the same foundation is Iesus Christ. What manner of foundation have we in Christ? is it that he was to vs the beginning of salvation: that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selves? and hath he but onely opened the way, by which we should go forward of our owne strength? Not to: but, as he said a little before, when we acknowledge him, he is to vs righteousnes. No man therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousness in him: forasmuch as the Apostle faith not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtaine righteousness, but that he himselfe might be our righteousness. Namely, that we are chosen in him from eternitie before the making of the worlde, by no defending of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death we are redeemed from the damnation of death, and delivered from destruction: that in him we are adopted of the heauenlie father into children and heirs: that by his bloud we are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him: to be kept we are delivered from perill of perishing and of being lost: that being so engrafted in him, we are alreadie after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdom of God by hope: and yet more: that having obtained such partaking of him, howsoever we be yet foole in our felues, he is wisefull for vs before God: howsoever we be sinners, he is righteous for vs: howsoever we be unclean, he is cleane for vs: howsoever we be weary, howsoever we be weake: howsoever we be armed & lying open in danger of Sathan, yet ours is the power which is giuen him in heauen and earth, whereby he may tred downe Sathan for vs, and braketh the gates of hells: howsoever we still carie about with vs the body of death, yet he is life for vs: briefly that all his things are ours, and we in him have all things, in our felues nothing. Upon this foundation, I say, it behoueth that we be builded, if we will encrease into a holy temple to the Lord.

6 But the world hath a long time beene otherwise taught. For there hath beene found out I wot not what morall good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be graffed in Christ. As though the Scripture did, when it faith, that they are all in death which have not possessed the Sonne. If they be in death, how should they bring forth matter of life? As though it were of no more force. force, that whatsoever is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good fruites of an euiil tree. But what have they most pesulent Sophists left to Christ wherein he may shew forth his power? They say that he hath conferred for us the first grace, namely the occasion of deserving: that it is now our part not to fail the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of vngodlinesse. Who would have thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so litle naked of power, and in a manner tread him vnder foote? This testimonie is ech where spoken of him, that all they are infallible that believe in him: these fellows teach, that there commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to every mans unjustifiable himselfe. But I would to God they taught what these sayings meant: that all they have life that have the Sonne of God: that whosoever believeth, is already pasted from death into life, that we are justified by his grace, that we might be made heires of eternall life: that the stairfull haue Christ abiding in them, by whom they are cleansed to God: that they which are partakers of his life, do so with him in heavenely places: that they are transplanted into the kingdom of God, and have obtained salvation and innumerable other such. For they do not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obtaine righteousnesse or salvation, but that they are both given to vs. Therefore so soon as thou art by faith engrossed into Christ, thou art already made the sonne of God, the heire of heaven, partaker of righteousnesse, possessor of life, and (that their lies may be better confounded) thou haft not obtained the fit ability to deere, but even all the deservings of Christ: for they are communica to thee.

7 So the Sorbonicall schoole, the mothers of all errors, have taken from vs the justification of faith which is the summe of all godliness. They grant verily in word, that man is justified by formed faith: but they afterward expound, because good works haue of faith this that they auail to righteousness: that they feeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, faith without great enuiousnesse it could not be passed over in silence, seeing it is so oft repeated of the Scripture. And not yet content, they do in the praise of good works prudely feale from God sometyme to give away to man. Because they fee that good works little auail to advance man, and that they cannot be properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruits of the grace of God: they picke them out of the strength of free will, sole forlooth of a stone. And they doe not in deede that the principal cause of them is in grace; but they affirm that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is all merite. And this not onlie the latter Sophists doe teach, but also their Pythagorast, Lombard: whom if you compare with these men, you may say to be found wittted and sober. It was truly a point of marvellous blindness, that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth, they sawe not with how great carefulnesse that man proued that no piece of the glory of good workes were it neuer so little, should be conveyed to men. Here before where we entreated of free will, we recetct certaine testimonies of his to this purpose, of which, sart there are oftentimes founde manie like in his writings, as when he forbiddeth vs that we should now where boast of our merits, because even they also are the gifts of God: And when he wrieth that all our merite is only of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiency, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombard was blind at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his discipules, than this word of the Apostle. For when he forbiddeth Christians all glorying, he adoineth a reason why it is not lawfull to glory: because we are that handwark of God, created to all good works, that we should walk in them. Sith therefore there commeth out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is whole of God without exception: there is no right why we should claim to our selves one ounce in good workes. Finally whereas whereas they continually call upon good works, in the meantime they so instruct confinences, that they never dare have affiance, that they have God well pleased and favourable to their works. But contrariwise we, without making mention of any Mente, do yet by our doctrine raise up the courages of the faithfull with singular comfort, when we teach them that in their works they please God, and are un-doubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea and also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to saie, vnlesse he do first with assured confidence of mind determine that he shall please God.

8 Wherefore let vs not suffer our felues to be led so much as one haire breadth away from this onely foundation: which being laid, wise builders do afterward well and orderly build vpon it. For if there be neede of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in mind, that the sonne of God hath appeared to this end, that he might destroy the worke of the diuell: that they should not sin which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessel of mercy chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthnese. But all is spoken at once, when it is shewed that Christ will have such disciples, which forsaking themselves, and taking vp their crosse, doe followe him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the roote of all evils, that he may no more feele those things that are his owne. He that hath taken vp his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and muddness. But the example of Christ contei-neth both these and all other duties of godlines and holinesse. He theyed himselfe obedient to his father, even to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the works of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glory of his father: he gave his soule for his brethren: he both did well and wished good to his enemies. If there be need of comfort, these will bring maruells of comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made carefull: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: we are brought low, but we are not confounded: we are thrown downe, but we do not perish: alway bearing about with vs in our body the mortifying of Iesus Christ, that the life of Iesus may be manifestly shewed in vs, that if we be dead with him, we shall also lye together with him: that we be so fashioned like to his sufferings, till we attaine to the likeness of his resurrection: For as much as the Father hath predilecte these to be fashioned like the image of his sonne, whom, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotten among all his brethren: and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall fever vs from the love of God which is in Christ: but rather all things shall turne to vs to good and to saluation. Lo, we do not suffifie a man by works before God: but we lay, that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a new creature, that they may paie out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteousnes, and that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are judged as trees by the fruiites.

The xvi. Chapter.

A confutation of the flanders, whereby the Tropis go about to bring this doctrine into hatred.

With this one word may the shamelesnesse of certaine vn godlie men be confuddled, which slander vs with saying that we destroy good works, and doe draw men away from the following of them, when we say that they are not suffified by works: nor doe defense saluation: and againe, that we make too easie a way to righteousnesse, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgivennesse of finnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much inclined thereto alreadye. These flanders (I say) are with that one word sufficiently
Cap. 16. Of the manner how to receive sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly answe to them both. They allege that by the justification of faith, good works are destroied. I leave vsspoken, what manner of men be these zealous louers of good works which doe so backbite vs. Let them hau licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiouly infect the whole world with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they be greeued, that when faith is so gloriously aduanced, works are druen downe out of their place. What if they be more raised vp, and stabllied? For neither doe we dreame of a faith voide of good works, nor a justification that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when we contesfe that faith and good works doe neceffarily hang together, yet we set justification in faith not in works. For what reason we doe so, we have in readi-nesse easily to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ vnto whom our faith is directe, and from whom it receiueth her whole strength. Why therefore are we justiyed by faith? because by faith we take holde of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take holde of, but thou must also therewithall take holde of sanctification. For he was giuen to vs, for righteous-nesse, wisdome, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ justiyed none whom he doth not also sanctifie. For these benefits are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnseparable knot, that whom he enlightneth with his wisdome, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth, he justiyeth: whom he justiyeth, he sanctifieth. But for as much as our question is onely of righteousnesse and sanctifying, let us stay upon these. We may put difference betweene them, yet Christ containeth them both unseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousnesse in Christ? Thou must first posseffe Christ: and thou canst not posseffe him, but that thou must be made partaker of his sanctification: because he cannot be torne in peeces. Sith therefore the Lord doth grant vs these benefits to be enjoyed none otherwith than in gii-ing himselfe, he giuen them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appeareth how true it is, that we are justified not without works, and yet not by works: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby we are justified, is no leffe contained sanctification than righteousnesse.

2. That also is most falle, that the mindes of men are withdrawn from the affection of wellness, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from reward to me-rite, as I shall afterwrad more plainly declare: namely, because they know not this principle, that God is no leffe liberall when he assigneth reward to works than when he giieth power to doe well. But this I had rather deferre to the place fit for it. Now it shall be enough to touch how weake their obstection is: which shall be done two waies. For first whereas they say that there shall be no care of well framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be intended when men ferue God, that they looke to reward or let out to hire or fell their labours to him, they little preuaile: for God will be freely worshippd, freely loued: he(If say) allooweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiuing reward is cut off, yet ceafteth not to worship him. Moreover, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurrets vnto them, than those that are taken of the end of our redemption and calling: such as the worde of God spurrets men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked vnthankfulness, not mutually to love him again: which first loued vs: that by the blood of Christ our confciences are clerised from dead works to ferue the living God: that it is a hainous faernlege, if being once cleansed, wee defile our fules with newe filthinesse, and prophane that holy blood: that we are deliuered from the handes of our enimies, that we may without fear ferue him in holinesse and righteousness before him all the daies of our life; that we are made free from finne, that we may with a free Spirite follow righteousness:
that our olde man is crucified, that we may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe,
the grace of Christ. Lib. 3. 214

again, that if we be dead with Christ (as becometh his members) we must serve Col. 3. 1. those things that are above, and must in the world be waifaring men from home, that we may long toward heaven where is our treasure: that the grace of God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking all vulgar lusts and worldly desires, we may live soberly, holy, and godly in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of the great God and Saviour: therefore that we are not appointed that we should stirre vp wrath to our selves, but that we may obtaine salvation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which it is not lawful to be defiled: that we are not darknesse, but light in the Lord, which must walke as children of light: that we are not called to vnleanness, but to holiness: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from vnlawfull desires: that our calling is holie, that the same is not fulfilled but with pureneffe of life: that we are for this purpose delivered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we be pricked forward to charitie with any more lively argument then that of John, that we should mutually love one an other as God hath loved vs? that herein his children do differ from the children of the Devil, the children of light from the children of darknesse, because they abide in lue? Againe with that argument of Paul, that we if we cleave to Christ, are the members of one bodie, which it is meete to be holpen one of another with mutuall duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holines than when we heare againe of John, that all they that have this hope, doe sanctifie themselues, because their God is holie? Againe of the mouth of Paul, I that having the promise of adoption, we should cleanse ourselves from all the defiling of the flesh and spirit? then when we heare Christ setting forth himselfe for an example unto vs that we shoul obay his steps?

3 And these few things I haue set forth for a teft: For if I shoul dare to goe through all, I shoulde be drue to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to very good worke, and that without any mention of merite. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this, that our saluation standeth upon the onlie mercie of God and vpon no merite of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for vs but in the righcourtes of Christ, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, he beseecheth them by that mercie of God which he hath vouchsafed to extend to vs. And trulie this one cause ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs. But if anie be not so vheemene moved with the glorie of God, yet the remembrance of his benefites ought to haue bin most sufficient to stirre vp such men to doe well. But these men, which do peradventure with thristing in ofmerites beare out some surnile and constrained obediences of the law, doe falsly feie that we have nothing whereby we may exhort men to good worke, because we go not the same way to worke. As though God were much delighted with such obediences which protesteth that he loueth a cheerefull gierer, and forbidden anything to be giuen as it were of heau-nesse or of necessitie. Neither do I speake this for that I doe either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes vseth, that it may leave no meane vnattempted every way to stirre vp our mindees. For it rehearseth the reward which God will render to euery man according to his worke. But I denie that that is the onlie thing, yea or the chiefe among manie. And then I graunt not that we ought to take beginning thereto. Moreover I affirme that it maketh nothing to the setting vp of such merites as these men boast of, as we shall hereafter see. Left of all I fay that is to no profitable use, vnlesse this doctrine haue first taken place, that wee are justified by the onlie merite of Christ, which is conceived by faith but by no merites of our workes, because none can bee fit to the endeavour of holiness, vnlesse they haue first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet vye
Cap. 17.

Of the maner how to receive very well signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercie that thou maist be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercie is acknowledged, upon which alone it is both founded and established. Which is verie worthie to be noted, that we may know not onely that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the fear of God (which the Papists will have to be meritorious) cannot haue the name of merite, because it is grounded upon the pardon and forgiuenesse of sins.

4. But it is a most vaine flander, that men are allured to sinne, when we affirm the free forgiuenesse of sins, in which we say that righteousnes confisiteth. For, we say that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompensed, and that therefore it should never be obtained, unlefe it were freely giuen. Moreover, that it is to vs indeeed freely giuen, but not so to Christ which bought it so deere, namely with his owne most holy bloode, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be pade to the judgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thank to them that the same most holy blood is not used so oft as they sinne. Furthermore, we learne, that our filthines is such, as is never washed away but with the fountaine of this most pure blood. Ought not they then to heare these things, to conceive a greater honour of sinne, than if it were faid that it is wipeed away with the sprinkling of good worke? And if they have any thing of God, how can they but dread being once cleaned, to wallow themselves againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to trouble and infect the purenes of this fountaine? I haue washid my feete (faith the faithfull soule in Salomon) how shall I againe defile them? Now it is evident, whether for do both more abate the forgiuenesse of sinnes, and doe more make vile the dignitie of righteousnes. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their doung: We affirm, that the gultines of sin is more grieuous than can be purged with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be releaved with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogative of the onely blood of Christ. They say that righteousnes (if it faile at any time) is restorid and repaired by satisfactorie worke: wee thikke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of worke, and that therefore for the restoring thereof we must flye to the onely mercie of God. As for the rest of those things, that pertaine to the forgiuenesse of sinnes, let them be fought out of the next Chapter.

The xvij. Chapter.

The agreement of the promises of the law and the Gospel.

Now let vs alfo go through the other arguments wherewith Satan by the soulers of his garde, goeth about either to overthrow or batter the iustification of faith. This I think we have alreadie wrang from the scroders, that they can no more chare vs as enemies of good worke. For, iustification is taken away from good worke, not that no good worke should be done, or that those which be done should be denied to be good, but that we should not put affiance in them, nor glorie in them, nor ascribe saluation vnto them. For this is our affiance, this is our glory, and the onely author of our salvation, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likeye are in him the sonnes of God, and heirs of the heavenly kingdome, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they do bide these affaires vs, as we haue faide, with other engines, goe to, let vs go forward in beating away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the law, which the Lorde did set forth to the keepers of his lawe: and they ask whether we will haue them to be utterly void of effectuall. Because Because it were an absurdity and to be scorned to say that they are void, they take it for confessed that they are of some effectualnesse. Hereupon they reason that wee are not justified by onely faith. For thus faith the Lord: and it shall be, if thou shalt hear these commandments and judgements, and shalt keepe them and doe them, the Lord also shall keepe with thee his covenant and mercie which he hath sworn to thy fathers, he shall love thee and multiply thee, and blesse thee, &c. Again, if yee shall well direct your waies and your endeavours, if yee walke not after strange Gods; if yee doe judgement betweene man and man, and goe not backe into malice, I will Deut.11.26. walke in the midst of you. I will not recite a thousand peeces of the same fort, which fith they nothing differing in sense, shall be declared by the solution of these. In a fumme, Moses teareth that in the lawe is set forth blessing and curse, death and life. Thus therefore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and fruitlesse, or that justification is not of faith alone. We have alreadye before shewed, how if wee stinke faft in the lawe, our vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth only curse which is threatened to all transgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his lawe, such as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that all mankinde is by the lawe accused, and subject to curse and the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needs goe out of the power of the lawe, and be as it were brought into libertie from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdrawe vs from the keeping of the lawe, should allure vs to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the futes being broken and with loose reines to run at riot: but the spiritual libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a difmaied and overthrowen conscience, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the lawe holdeth it downe bound and fast. This deliverance from the subjection of the lawe, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obataine when by faith we take holde of the mercie of God in Christ, whereby we are certifie and assur'd of the righteousnes of sinnes, with the feeling whereof the lawe did pricke and bite vs.

2 By this reason even the promises that were offer'd vs in the lawe should bee all vneffectual and void, unlesse the goodnesse of God by the Gospel did helpe. For this condition that we keepe the whole lawe, upon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, shall never be fulfilled. And the Lorde so helpeth, not by leaving part of righteousnes in our workes, and supplying part by his mercifull bearing with vs, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousness. For the Apostle, when he had before sayd that he and other Jews beleued in Iesus Christ, knowing that man is not justfied by the workes of the lawe, doth addeth a reason: not that they shoulde be holpen to fulfille of righteousness by the faith of Christ, but by it should be justified not by the works of the law. If the faithfull remoue from the lawe into faith, that they may in faith finde righteousnesse which they see to be absent from the lawe: truly they forfake the righteousnesse of the lawe. Therefore now let him that lift, amplify the rewarings which are faide to be prepared for the keeper of the lawe, so that he therewithall consider that it commeth to passe by our peruerstie, that we feel no fruite thereof till we have obtained an other righteousnesse of faith. So David when he made mention of the rewarings which the Lorde hath prepared for his fervants, by and by: descendeth to the reknowledging of sinnes, whereby that same rewarding is made void. Also in the xix. Psalm, he gloriously setteth forth the benefits of the lawe, but he by and by crieth out: Who shall understand his faults? Lord cleane me from my secret faults? Psal. 19.12. This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had faide that all the wares of the Lord are goodnesse and truth thereunto he saith, he addeth: For thy names sake Lorde, thou shalt be mercifull to my peruersties, for it is much. So ought wee also to reknowledging, that there is indeed the good will of God set forth into Cap. 17. Of the maner how to receiue vnto vs in the law, if we might deserue it by works, but that the same never commeth to vs by the deseruing of works.

3 How then? are they gien that they should vanish away without fruit? I have euene now already protesteth that the same is not my meaning. I laye verely that they vther not their effectuallnes toward vs, so long as they haue respect to the merite of works, and that therefore if they be considerd in them selves, they bee after a certaine maner abolisht. If the apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I haue gien you their commandements, which who so shal do shall live in them, is of no value if we stand still in it, and shall never a withe more profit then if it had not beene gien at all: because it belongeth not euene to the most holy seruants of God, which are all farre from the fulfilling of the law, but are compasshed about with manie transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospels are put in place of them, which doe offer free forgiveness of sins, they bring to passe that not onely wee our selves be acceptable to God, but that our works also have their thanke: and not this onely that the Lorde accepteth them, but also extendeth to them the blessings which were by covenante due to the keeping of the law. I grant therefore, that those things which the Lorde hath promiseth in his law to the followers of righteousness and holiness, are renderd to the works of the faithfull: but in this rendring the cause is alwaies to bee considered that powreth grace to works. Now caueth we fee that there be three. The first is, that God turning away his sight from the works of his seruants, which alwaies deserue rather preache than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely mean of faith reconcilith them to his inuillie without the meane of works. The second, that of his fatherly kindnes and tender mercifulnes, he lifteth vp works to so great honor, not weyng the worthines of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiueth the very same works with pardon, not imputing the imperfection, wherewith they bee desirous should otherwise be rather reckoned among sins than vertues. And hereby appereth how much the Sophisters haue bin deceived, which thought they had gaily elapped all absurdisties, when they faide that works do not of their owne inward goodnesse auable to deserue saluation, but by the forme of the couenant, because the Lorde hath of his liberalitie so much esteemed them. But in the meanetine they considered not, how farre those works which they would have to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promisses, unless there went before both justification grounded upon onely faith, and the forgiveness of sinnes, by which euen the good works themselves haue need to be wiped from spots. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberalitie, by which it is brought to passe that the works of the faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one one and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

4 These alleage the laying of Peter, which Luke reheareth in the Acts: I finde in truth that God is not an acceptor of persons: but in euery nation he that doth righteousnesse is acceptable to him. And hereupon they gather that which feemeth to be undoubted, that if man doth by right endeavours ge himselfe the favour of God, it is not the beneficall gift of God alone that he obtayneth saluation: yea that God doth so of his mercy helpe a sinne, that he is by works bowed to mercy. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, vnlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby he may be inclined to mercie, but onelie miserie. If therefore it bee certaine that man is naked and neede of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loaden with all kindes of euils, when God first receiueth them for what quality, I praie you, shall we faie that he is worthy of the heavenly calling? Away therefor with the vaine imaginings of mericts, where God so evidently seteth out his free mercifulnesse. For, that which in the same place is faie by the voice of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men men most lewdly wrested, that man by enduoure of good works is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it must needs be that cornelius was alreadie enlightened with the spirit of wisdome, Sith he was endued with true wisdome, namely with the fear of God: that he was sanctified with the same Spirit, Sith he was a follower of righteousness, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certaine fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to have pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it off that he did by his owne enduoure prepare himselfe to receive it. Truly there cannot one syllable of the scripture be brought forth, that agreeth not with this doctrine, that there is none other cause for God to accept man vnto him, but because he seeth that man should be every way lost, if he be left to himselfe: but because he will not haue him lost, he vieth his owne mercie in delivering him. Now see we how this accepting hath not regard to the righteousnesse of man, but is a meere token of the goodnesse of God toward men being miserable and most vnworthie of so great a benefite.

But after that the Lord hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and seuered him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath never begotten him and newly formed him into a new life, he now embraceth him, as a new creature with the gifts of his Spirit. This is that accepting whereof Peter mentioneth, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of works: for the Lord cannot but loue & kisse those good things which he worketh in them by his Spirit. But this is alwaies to be remembred, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of works, but in as much as for their cause and for their takes, whatsoever good works he hath gitten them in increasong of his liberalitie, he also vouchsafeth to accept. For whence haue they good works, but because the Lord, as he hath chosen them for vessels vnto honoure, so will garnish them with true godlynesse? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly gransent pardon to those defforiuties and spots that cleaue to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and lovely in whom hee seeth the marke and features of his owne face. For we haue in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in vs. For as much as there wherefore the Lord beholdeth his owne face, he both woorthily loueth it and hath it in honoure: it is not without cause faide, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holinesse and righteousness pleaseth him, but because the godly being clothed with mortall flesh, are yet finners, and their good works are but begun and favouring of the fauintnesse of the flesh: hee cannot bee favourable neither to those nor to these: vntil hee more embrace them in Christ then in themselues. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testifie that God is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousness. Moses saide to the Israelites, The Lord thy God keepeth covenant, to a thousand generations: which sentence was afterward vied of the people for a common manner of speech. So Solomon in his solemn prayer, faith, Lord God of Israel, which keepest covenant and mercie to thy seruants which walke before thee in their whole hart. The fame words are also repeated of Nehmias. For, as in all the covenants of his mercie, the Lord likewise on their behalfe requireth of his seruants uprightness and holiness of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaie rejoicing by reason thereof shoulde blesse his owne soule, walking in the meane time in the perusuance of his owne hart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their dutie them that are admitted into the communion of the covenent: yet nevertheless the covenent it selfe is both made at the beginning free, and perpetually remaineth such. After this manner David when hee gloried that there was rendered to him reward of the cleannesse of his handes, yet omitted not that fountain.

fountaine which I have spoken of, that he was drawn out of the wombe, because God loved him; where he so fetteth out the goodnes of his caufe, that he abateth nothing from the free mercie which goeth before all gifts, whereof it is the beginning.

6 And here by the way it shall be profitable to touch what these forms of speaking doe differ from the promises of the lawe. I call promises of the lawe, not those which are eachwhere commonly written in the booke of Moses: (for as much as in them also are found many promises of the Gopell) but those which properly belong to the minifterie of the lawe. Such promises, by what name soever you lift to call them, doe declare that there is rewardes ready vpon condition, if thou doe that which is commanded thee. But when it is faide, that the Lord kepent the covenant of mercie to them which loue him, therein is rather shewed what manner of men be his servants which haue faithfully receiv'd his covenants, than the caufe is expressed why the Lord should doe good to them. Now this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouchfaileth to grant vs the grace of eternal life, to this end that he should be loued, feared, and honored of vs: so whatsoever promises there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this end, that we should reverence and worship the author of the benefites. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that keepe his lawe, let vs remember that the children of God are there signified by the dutie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cause adopted, that we should honour him for our Father. Therefore least we should disherit our selues from the right adoption, we must alway endeavour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let vs againe keepe this in minde, that the accomplishment of the mercie of God hangeth not vpon the worke of the faithfull: but that he therefore fulfillit the promise of salvation to them which anfwere to their calling in vprightneffe of life, because in them he acknowledgeth the natural tokens of his children which are ruled with his spirite vnto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Psalme spoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lord who shall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who shall rest in thy holy hill? The innocent in hands and of a cleane hart, &c. Againe in Ezaire, Who shall dwell with devouring fire? He that doth righteousnesse, he that speaketh righteous things, &c. For there is not defcribed the fay whereupon the faithfull may stand before the Lord, but the manner wherewith the most mercifull father bringeth them into his fellowship, and therein defendeth and strengtheneth them. For, because hee abhorreth finne, hee loueth righteousnesse, whom he ioyneth to himselfe, them he cleanseth with his spirite, that he may make them of like fashion to himselfe, and his kingdom. Therefore if the question be of the first caufe whereby the entrie is made open to the holy ones into the kingdom of God, from whence they haue that they may stande faft and abide in it, we haue this anfwere ready, because the Lord by his mercie both hath once adopted them, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the question be of the manner, then we must come downe to regeneration and the frutes thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalme.

7 But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good worke with the title of righteousnesse, and affirme that man is suffici'd by them. Of the first fort there be very many places where the obferuations of the commandements are called righteousness or righteousneses. Of the other fort, that is an example which is in Moses. This shall be our righteousnesse, if we keepe all these commandements. And if thou take exception and say that this is a promise of the lawe, which being knit to a condition impossible, prooweth nothing. There be other of which you cannot make the same anfwere, as this: And that shall be to thee for righteousnesse before the Lord to redeem thee from the poore man his pledge, &c. Againe, that which the Prophet faith, that the zeale in reengeance the name of Israel, was imputed to Phinees for righteousnesse. Therefore the Pharifees of our time time thinke that here they have a large matter to triumph upon. For when we saie, that when the righteouines of faith is set vp, the iustification of works giueth place, by the same right they make this argument: if righteouines be of works, then it is faile that we are iustified by faith onely. Though I grant that the commandements of the law are called righteouines. It is no maruell: for they are so indeed. Howbeit we must warn the Readers that the Grecians haue not slyly translated the Hebrew word Huemi, Dikaiomata, righteouines for commandements. But for the wordes, I willingly release my quantell. For neither doe wee deny this to the lawe of God, that it conteneth perfect righteouines. For although, because we are debtors of all the things that it commandeth, therefore even when we have performed full obedience thereof, wee are vnprofitable servants; yet because the Lord vouchsafed to grant it the honour of righteouines, we take not away that which he hath given. Therefore we willingly confesse that the full obedience of the law is righteouines, that the keeping of euery commandement, is a part of righteouines, if so be that the whole summe of righteouines were had in the other partes also. But we deny that there is any where any such forme of righteouines. And therefore we take away the righteouines of the lawe, not for that it is mainned and vnperfect of it selfe, but for that by reason of the weakenes of our fleshe it is no where seene. But the Scripture not onely calleth simpyle the commandements of the Lorde righteouines; but it also giueth this name to the workes of the holy ones. As when it reporteth that Zacharias and his wife walked in the righteouines of the Lord; truely when it saith he weighteth workes rather by the nature of the lawe, than by their owne proper state. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I euen now saie, that of the negligence of the Grecian translator is not a lawe to be made. But forasmuch as Luke woulde alter nothing in the received translation, I will alwayes signifie about it. For God hath commandeth these things that are in the lawe to men for righteouines: but this righteouines we perfoame not but in keeping the whole lawe: for euery transgression it is broken. Whereas therefore the lawe doth nothing but prescribe righteouines: if we haue respect to it, all the seuerall commandements thereof are righteouines: if we haue respect to men of whom they are done, they do not obtaine the praise of righteouines by one worke, being trespassters in many, and by that fame worke which is ever partly faultie by reason of imperfection.

8 But nowe I come to the second kinde, in which is the chief hardnesse. Paul hath nothing more strong to proue the righteouines of faith: than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteouines. Sith therefore it is faide that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteouines: what Paul affirmeth of faith, the same may we also conclude of workes. Whereupon our adversaries, as though they had wonne the victorie, determine that we are indeed not iustified without faith, but that we are alwayes not iustified by it alone, and that works accomplish our righteouines. Therefore here I beseech the godlie, that if they know that the true rule of righteouines is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously and earnestly weigh with me, how the Scripture may without cauillations be rightly made to agree with it selfe. Forasmuch as Paul knew that the iustification of faith is the refuge for them that are defruine of their owne righteouines, he doth boldly conclude that all they that are iustified by faith, are excluded from the righteouines of workes. But Sith it is certaine that the iustification of faith is common to all the faithful, he doth thereof with like boldnesse conclude that no man is iustified by workes, but rather contrariwise that men are iustified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to dispute of what value workes are by themselves, and another thing what account is to be made of them after the stablishing of the righteouines of faith. If wee shall set a price upon workes according to their worthiness, we say that they are unworthy to come into the sight of God: and therefore that man hath no works whereof he may glory before God; then, that being spoiled of all helpe of works he is inflidshed by onely faith. Now we define righteousness thus, that a sinner being receiued into the communion of Christ is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his blood he obtaieth forgiveness of sins, and being cloathed with his righteousness as with his owne, he standeth assured before the heavenly judgment seat. When the forgiveness of sins is set before, the good works which follow have now another valuation then after their owne deserving: because whatsoever is in them unperfect, is couered with the perfection of Christ: whatsoever spots or filthines there is, it is wiped away with his cleanness, that it may not come into the examination of the judgment of God. Therefore when the guiltines of all trespasses is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to desile good works: the good works which the faithfull do are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousness.

9 Now if any man object this against me to take away the righteousness of faith, first I will ask whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holy works, being in the rest of the works of his life a trespasser of the law. This is more than an absurdity. Then I will ask if he be counted righteous for many good works, if he be in any part found guilty. This also he shall not be so bold to affirm, when the penall ordination of the law crieth out against it, and proclameth all them accursed which have not fulfilled all the commandments of the law to the uttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and ask, whether there be any works that deserveth to be accused of no uncleanenes or imperfection. And howe could there be any such before those eies, to whom even the verie flares are not cleane enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shall he be compelled to grant that there is no good work which is not bespotted with transgressions adjoyned with it, and with the corrupted fulfe, that it cannot haue the honoure of righteousness. Now if it be certaine that it procedeth from the righteousness of faith that works which are otherwise vnpuere, vncaene, and but halfe works, not worthe of the sight of God, much lesse of his loue, are imputed to righteousness, why do they with boaste of the righteousness of works destroie the justification of faith, whereas if this justification were not, they shoule in vaine boaste of that righteousness? Will they make a vipers birth? For there to tend the waying of the vnaughtly men. They cannot deny that the justification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousness of works: yet they conelueth that man is not justified by faith, because good works also are accounted for righteousness. Therefore let vs passe these fallacies and confutte as the truth is, that if the righteousness of works of what sort soever it be accounted, hangeth upon the justification of faith, it is by this not only nothing minished but also confirmed, namely whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mightie. Neither yet let vs think that works are so commended after free justification, that they also afterward come into the place of justifying a man, or doe part the office betwene them and faith. For vnlesse the justification remaine alway whole, the uncleanes of works shall be vnotcouerd. And it is no absurdity, that a man is to justified by faith that not onely he himselfe is righteous, but also his works are esteemed righteous, above their worthines.

10 After this manner we will grant in works not onely a righteousness in part (as our adversaries themselves would haue) but also that it is allowed of God as it were a perfect and full righteousness. But if we remember upon what foundation it is vpholden, all the difficulty shall be dissolved. For then and not till then it beginneth to be an acceptable work, when it is receiued with pardon. Now whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both vs and all our things in Christ? Therefore Therefore as we, when we are grafted into Christ, doe therefore appear righteous before God, because our wickednesse are covered with his innocencie, so our works are and be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultinesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleanses of Christ, it is not imputed. So we may rightfully say, that by onely Faith not onely we but also our works are justified. Now if this right- teousnesse of works of what sort soever it be, hangeth upon Faith and free justification, and is made of it: it ought to be included under it, and to be sett under it as the effect under the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it off that it ought to be raised vp either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to drive men to confesse that our blessednes consisteth of the mercie of God, not of works, chiefly enforcement that saying of David. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sinnes are covered. Blessed is he to whom the Lord hath not imputed sin. If any man doe thrust into the contrary innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to be gonne to works, as are these: Blessed is the man which searcheth the Lord, which hath pity on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsell of the wicked, which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which kepe judgement, the undefiled, the poore in Spirit, the meek, the mercyfull, &c. They shall not make but that it shall be true which Paul sayeth, For because these things that there are commended are newe so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alwaies miserable, vnlesse he be delivered from misery by forgiveness of sinnes. Forasmuch as therefore all the kinds of blessednesse which are extolled in the Scriptures, doe fall downe void, so that man receueth no benefit of none of them, till he have obtained blessednesse by forgiveness of sinnes, which may afterward make place for them: it followeth that this is not onely the highest and the chiefest but also the only blessednes: vnlesse peradventure you will have that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Now there is much lesse reason why the calling of men righteous should trouble vs, which is commonly given to the Faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holines of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeavoure to the following of rightcounsies, than doe fulfill rightcounsies it selfe, it is meete that this rightcounsies such as it is, give place to the justification of Faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

But they say that we have yet more businesse with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth against vs. For he teacheth both that Abraham was justified by works, and also that all we are justified by works, not by Faith onely. What then will they draw Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a minifter of Christ, his saying must be so taken that it disagree not from Christ preaching by the mouth of Paul. The holy Ghost affirmeth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained rightcounsies by Faith, not by works: and we also doe teach that all are justified by Faith without the works of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by James that both Abraham rightcounsies and ours consisteth of works, not of onely Faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himselfe. What agreement is there be of these two? It is enough for the aduersaries, if they plucke the rightcounsies of Faith which we would have to be fastened with most deepe roots: but to render to confi- dences their quietnes, they have no great care. Whereby verily you may see that they grant the justification of Faith, but in the mean time doe appoint no marke of righ- tccounsies where confiendes may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they lift, so that they may boast of no other victorie than that they have taken away all certaine of rightcounsies. And this wretched victorie they shall obtaine, where the light of truth being quenched, the Lord shall suffer them to overspread the darkenes of lies. But whereoeuer the truth of God shall stand, they shall nothing preuaile. I denye therefore that the saying of Iames which they still continually holde vp against vs as it were the shield of Achilles doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plaine, first we must looke at the marke that the Apostle shooteth

shooeth that: and then we must note where they be deceiued. Because there were then manie (which mischifes is worst to be continuall in the Church) which openly betrayed their insidellitie, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithfull, and yet ceaseth not to boast of the false name of faith: James doth heere mocke the foolish boldnes of such men. Therefore it is not his purpose in any point to diminish the force of true faith, but to shew how fondly those trifters did chalenge so much the vaine image of it, that being conteneth berewith they carelesly taine disolutely abroade into all licentiousnes of vices. This ground being conceiued, it shall be easie to perceiue where our aduersaries doe misse. For they fall into two de-cuets in the worde, the one in the name of faith, the other in the worde of justifying.

Whereas the Apostle nameth faith a vaine opinion far distant from the truth of faith, it is spoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he sheweth at the beginning in these words. What profeth it, my brethren, if any man say that he hath faith, and hath no worke? Hee doth not say, if any haue faith without worke, but, If any man boaste. More plaine also he speakest a little after, where he in moccerie maketh it worke than the doubtfull knowledge: last of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may sufficiently perceiue what he meaneth. Thou beleeuest (faith he) that there is a God. Truely if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleeue that there is a God, it is now no manuell if it do not justifie. And when this is taken from it, let vs not thinke that any thing is abated from the christian faith, the nature whereof is far otherwise. For after what maner doth true faith justifie vs, but when it coniugemeth vs with Christ, that being made one with him we may enjoy the partaking of his righteounes: It doth not therefore justifie vs by this that it containeth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this that it resteth upon the assured-ces of the mercie of God.

Neither doth S.

Lames use the word justificacion, as S.Paul dooth, but in a meaning far different: S. Paul meaning thereby the impu-ratio of righteounes and S.Lames the declaration of that righteounes by worke, where without worke was imposed.

12 We haue not yet the worke, vnlesse we examine also the other deceipt in the word, forasmuch as Lames setteth part of justifiction in workes. If you will make Lames agreeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, and with himselves, you must of ne-cessitie take the word of justifiction in another signification than it is taken in Paul: For Paul faith that we are justifie, when the remembrance of our vnrighteounes being blopted out, we are accounted righteous. If Lames had meant of that taking, he had wrongly allledged that out of Moses: Abraham beleue God, &c. For he thus frameth it together. Abraham by worke obtained righteounes, because he stickeh not at the commandement of God, to offer vp his sonne. And so the scripture was fulfilled, which faith, that he beleued God, and it was imputeth to him for righteounes. If it be an abstrutie, that the effect is before his caufe, either Moses doth that place falsely testifie, that faith was imputeth to Abraham for righteounes: or he deluered not righteounes by that obedience which he shewed in offering vp of Isaac. Abraham was justifie by his faith, When Isaac was not yet conceiued, which was now grown past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shall we say, that hee got to himselfe righteounes by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either Lames did wrongly misurne the order (which it is a wickedneffe to thinke) or he meant not to say that he was justifie, as though he deluered to be accounted righteous. How then? Truely it appeareth that he speakeoth of the declaration of righteounes and not the imputation: as if he had said: Wesho are righteous by true faith, they do proue their righteounes with obedience and good worke, not with a bare and imagelike visor of faith. In a summme, he dupuneth not by what meane we are justifie, but he requireth of the faithfull a working righteounes. And as Paul affirmeth that men bee justifie without the helpe of worke: so Lames doeth here also for them to be accounted righteous which want good workes. The considering of this end,shall deluere vs out of all doubt. For our aduersaries are hereby chiefly de-ceiued, that they thinke that Lames defineth the maner of justificking, whereas he travel-

asileth about nothing but to overthrow their perverse carelesnesse, which did vainly pretend faith to excuse their defpising of good workes. Therefore into howe manie waies for ever they wrett the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodileffe shew of faith doth not justify, and that a faithfull man not contended with such an imaginatif shewe, doth declare his righteousness by good workes.

13 As for that which they allege out of Paul, the same meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers, are justified, it nothing helpeth them. I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the lawe is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a meerely starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is abroad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the lawes from foolish confidence, which boasted themselves of the only knowledge of the lawe, when in the mean time they were the greatest defpisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their own conceit for the bare knowledge of the lawe, he warneth them, that if righteousness be sought out of the lawe, not the knowledge but the obseruing of it is required. We verily make no doubt of this that the righteousness of the law standeth in works: not yet of this alfo, that the righteousness consisteth in the worthines and merites of workes. But it is not yet prooued, that we are justified by workes, vnslee the bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none other wise, the haging together of the text shal be a sufficient testimoine. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Iewes of vnrighteouines, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and faith, that they which sinned without the Law, do perish without the Law: which is spoken of the Gentiles: but they which have sinned in the law, are judged by the law: which pertaineth to the Iewes. Now because they winking at their owne trefpassings proudly gloried of the onely lawe: hee adioyneth that which most fitly agreed, that the lawe was not therefore made, that men should be made righteous by onely hearing of the voice thereof: but then and not till then when they obeyed, as he should say: Seekest thou righteousness in the lawe: allege not the hearing of it, which of it selfe is of small importance, but bring workes, by which thou maist declare that the lawe was not set for thee in vaine. Of these workes because they were all desitute, it followed that they were spoiled of glorying of the lawe. Therefore we must of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrarie argument. The righteousness of the lawe consisteth in the perfection of workes. No man can boast that he hath by workes satisfied the law. Therefore there is no righteousness by the lawe.

14 Now they allege also these places, wherein the faithfull doe boldly offer their righteousness to the judgement of God to be examin'd, and require that sentence be given of them according to it. Of which sort are these: Judge me O Lord according to my righteousness, and according to my innocencie, which are in me. Againe, Hear my righteousness, O God: Thou hast proued my heart, and hast visited it in the night, and there was no wickednes found in me. Againe, The Lord shall render to me according to my righteousness, and he shall recompence me according to the cleanness of my hands. Because I have kept the ways of the Lord, & have not wickedly departed from my God. And I shall be vnspotted, and shall keepe me from my iniquity. Again, Judge me, Lord, because I have walked in mine innocencie. I have not sat with lying men, I will not enter in with them that do wicked things. Destroy not my soule with the vngodly, my life with men of blood in whose handes are iniquities: whose right hand is filled with gifts. But I have walked innocently. I have aboue spoken of the affiance which the holy ones doe seeme simply to take to themselues of workes. As for these testimoines that we haue here alleged, they shall not much accombre us if they be understood according to their compass, or (as they commonly call it) their circumstance. Now the same is double. For nei-

The prestation which faithfull men do make of their innocencie in the sight of God, are no arguments that they suffred themselves thereby justified before him.

ther would they have them to be wholly examined that they should be either condemned or acquitted according to the continual course of their whole life: but they bring into judgement a special cause to be debated. Neither do they claim to themselves righteousness in respect of the perfection of God, but by comparison of naughty and wicked men. First when the justifying of man is entreated of, it is not only required that he have a good cause in some particular matter, but a certain perpetual agreement of righteousness in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call up the judgement of God to approve their impeccability, do not offer themselves free from all guiltines and in cuerie behalfe failifie: but verily when they have fastened their affiance of salvation in his goodness only, yet trusting that he is the reuenger of the poore afflicted against right and equitie, they commend to him the cause wherein the innocent are opprest. But when they let their adversaries with them before the judgement fear of God, they boast not of such an impeccability as shall answere to the purenesse of God if it be severely searched, but because in comparison of the malice, obstinacie, sullenlie and wickednes of their adversaries, they know that their plainnesse, righteousness, simplicity, and cleanness is known and pleasing to God: they feare not to call upon him to judge between themselves and them. So when David said to Saul: The Lord render to every man according to his righteousness and truth: he meant not that the Lord should examine by himselfe and reward every man according to his desertings, but he tooke the Lord to witness, how great his impeccability was in comparison of the wickednes of Saul. And Paul himselfe, when he boasteth with this glorying that he hath a good witness of conscience, that he hath travelled with simplicity and uprightness in the Church of God, meaneth not that he standeth upon such glorying before God, but being compell'd with the flanders of the wicked, he defendeth his faithfull and honest dealing, which he knew to be pleasing to the mercifull kindness of God, against all euil speaking of men whatsoever it be. For we see what he saith in another place, that he knoweth no euil by himselfe, but that he is not thereby justified, namely because he knewe that the judgement of God faire surmouneth the blae-eyed fight of men. Howsoever therefore the godly doe defend their impeccability against the hypocritie of the vngodly, by the witnesing and judgement of God: yet when they haue to do with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquitie, Lorde, Lord who shall abide it? Enter not into judgement with thy seruants: because euery one that liueth shall not be justified in thy light: and distrustin they owne works, they gladly sing, Thy goodnes is better than life.

15 There are also other places not unlike to these before, in which a man may yet tarie. Salomon faith, that he which walketh in his uprightness, is righteous. Again: That in the path of righteousness is life, and that in the same is not death. After which manner Ezekiel reporteth that hee shall live life that doth judgement and righteousness. None of these doe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sons of Adam with such an uprightness. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the fantasterie of mercy. Neither do we in the mean time deny but that to the faithfull their uprightness, though it be but half and vnperrfect, is a steppe towards immortality. But whencesoever that but because whom the Lord hath taken into the covenant of grace, he searcheth not their works according to their desertings, but kisseth them with fatherly kindness? Whereby we do not only understand that which the schoolemen do teach, that works have their value of the accepting grace. For they mean that works which are otherwise insufficient to purchase righteousness by the covenant of the lawe, are by the accepting of God advanced to the value of equalitie. But I say that they being defiled both with other trespassings & with their owne sins, are of no other value at all, than insomuch as the Lord tenderly granteeth pardon to both: that is to say, giueth free righteousness to man. Neither are here those prayers of the Apostle reasonably thrust in place, where he wilfully so great perfection to the faithful, that they may be faultless & unblamable in the day of the Lord. These words in deed the Celestines did in old time to unmoile, to affirm a perfection of righteousness in this life. But which we think to be sufficient, we answer briefly after Augustine, that all the godly ought in deed to endeavour towards this marker, that they may one day appeare spotless and faultless before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, we shall then and not till then attaine to this marker, when being uncloathed of this flesh of sinnewee shall fully cleare to the Lorde. Yet will I not stilly strue with him which will give the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that he also limit the same with the wordes of Augustine himselfe. When (faith he) we will call the virtue of the holy ones perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in truth and humilitie.

That of the rewardes, the righteousnesse of works is ill gathered.

Now let vs passe ouer to those sayings which affirm, that God will render to every man according to his works: of which sort are these. Every man shall bear away that which he hath done in the body, either good or euill. Glorie and honour to him that worketh good: trouble and dishonour upon every soule of him that worketh euill. And they which have done good things, shall go into the resurrection of life: they which have done euill, into the resurrection of judgement. Come yee blessed of my father: I haue hungred, and yee gaue mee meate: I haue thirsted, and yee gaue me drink; &c. And with them let vs also ioyne these sayings, which call eternal life the reward of works. Of which sort are these. The rendering of the hands of a man shall be restored to him. He that feareth the commandements shall be rewarded. Be glad and rejoyce, behold, your reward is plentifull in heauen. Every man shall receive reward according to his labour. Where it is said that God shall render to every man according to his works, the same is easily asbyled. For that manner of speaking doth rather thewe the order of following, than the cause. But it is out of doubt, that the Lord doth accomplish our saluation by these degrees of his mercie, when those whom he hath chosen he calleth to him: those whom he hath called, he justifieth: those whom he hath justifieth, he glorifieth. Although therefore he do by his only mercie receive them that be into life, yet because he bringeth them into the possession thereof by the race of good works, that he may fulfill his worke in them by such order as he hath appointed: it is no maruell if it be faide that they bee crowned according to their works, by which without doubt they are prepared to receive the crowne of immortalitie. Yea and after this manner it is fitly faide that they worke their owne saluation, when in applying themselves to good worke, they pracie themselves toward eternal life: namely as in another place they are commanded to work the meate which perisheth not, when by beleevint in Christ they get to themselves life: and yet it is by and by afterwarde added: Which the sone of man shall give you. Whereby appeareth that the worde of Working is not set as contrary to grace, but is referred to endeuow: & therefore it followeth not, that either the faithful are themselves authors of their owne saluation, or that the same proceedeth from their works. How then? So sone as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by knowledge of the Gospel, & the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternal life is begun in them. Now the same good worke which God hath begun in them, must also be made perfect vntill the date of the Lorde Iesus. And it is made perfect, when resemb-blinging the heavenly father in righteousness and holiness, they prove themselves to be his children not swarne out of kinde.

2 There is no cause why we should of the name of reward gather an argument that our works are the cause of salvation. First let this be determined in our hearts, that the kingdom of heaven is not a reward of servants, but an inheritance of children, which they only shall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to be his children: and for no other cause, but for this adoption. For, the sonne of the bondwoman shall not be heire, but the sonne of the free woman. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghost promiseth to worke eternall glorie for reward, in expressing the inheritance by name, he sheweth that it commeth from elsewhere. So Christ rehearseth works, which he repromiseth with the rewarding of heaven, when he calleth the elect to the possession thereof: but he therewith all adiomyth that it must be possessed by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth servants, which do their dutie faithfully, to hope for reward of the Lord: but he addeth, of inheritance. We see how they do as it were by express words promise that we impire not eternall blessednes works, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore do they therewithall together make mention of works? This question shall be made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Isaac, there was promiseth to Abraham a seed in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and a multiplying of his seele, which should match the starrs of the skie, and the lands of the see, and other like. In many yeres afterward, Abraham, as he was commandeth by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer vp his sonne in sacrifice. When he had performed this obedience, he received a promis. I haue swornep by my selfe (faith the Lord) because thou haft done this thing, and haft spared thine owne only begotten sonne, I will blesse thee, and multiply thy seele as the starrs of the skie, and the lands of the see: thy seele shall possesse the gates of their enemies, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in thy seele,because thou haft obeyed my voice. What hearte we? Hath Abraham by his obedience deferte the blesseing, the promisse whereof he had receiveth before that the commandement was given? Here verily we haue it without circumstances thowed, that the Lorde rewarded the worke of the faithfull with those benefites which he had alreadie given them before that the works were thought of, haung yet no cause why he should do good to them but his owne mercie.

3 Yet doth the Lord not deceiue nor mock vs when he faith that he rendreth for reward to worke the same thing which he had before worke freely given. For, becaue he will haue vs to be exercized with good works, to thinke upon the deliverie or enjoying (as I may so call it) of these things which he hath promiseth, and to runne through them to the blessed hope set before vs in heauen, the fruites of the promiseth also rightly assigned to them, to the ripeness whereof they do not bring vs. The Appostle very sily expressed both these points, when he said that the Coloffians apply themselves to the duties of charitie, for the hope which is laide vp for them in heauen, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospell. For when he faith that they knew by the Gospell, that there was hope laid vp for them in heauen, he declareth that the same is by Christ only, not vnderprophec with any worke. Wherewith accordeth that saying of Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, vnto the salvation which is readye to be manifesstly thowed at the time appointed for it. When he faith that they labour for it, he signifieth that the faithfull must runne all the time of their life, that they may attaine to it.
But least we should thinke that the reward which the Lord promiseth vs, is reduced to the measure of merite, he did put forth a parable, in which he made himselfe a houholder, which sent all them that he met, to the trimming of his vineyard, some at the first hour of the day, some at the second, some at the third, yea and some also at the 11. At evening he paide to every one equall wages. The expolation of which parable,
parable, that same old writer whatsoever he was, whose booke is carried abroad under the name of, Ambrose of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truly set out. I will see rather his words than mine owne. The Lord (as it were) by the rule of this comparison hath established the dueritie of manyfold calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyard at the 11. hour, are made equall with them that had wrought the whole day, do represent the estate of them, whom for the aduauncing of the excellencie of grace, the tender kindnesse of the Lord hath rewarded at the waning of the day, and at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labor, but pouring out the riches of his goodness upon them whom he hath chosen without works, that even they also which have swept in great labour, and have receiued no more than the last, may understand that they have receiued a gift of grace, not a reward of works. Last of all, this also is worthie to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the reward of works, that it is not simply taken for the communicating which we haue with God to blessed immortallie, when he embraceth vs with fatherly good will in Christ: but for the possessing or enjoying (as they call it) of blessednes, as also the very words of Christ do found, In time to come life everlasting. And in another place, Come and possesse the kingdome, &c. After this manuer Paul calleth adoption, the receiuing of the adoption which shall be made in the resurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our bodie. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternall death, so when man is receiued of God into favour, that he may enjoy the communicating of him and be made one with him, he is receiued from death to life: which is done by the beneficall means of adoption only. And if, as they are wont, they stily enforce the reward of works, we may turne against them that sayng of Peter, that eternall life is the reward of faith.

4. Therefore let vs not thinke, that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthines of our works, as if they deteruied such reward. For the Scripture leaueth nothing to vs, whereof we may be aduaunced in the sight of God: But rather it wholly endeauoureth to bate downe our arrogancies, to humble vs, to throw vs downe, and altogether to breake vs in peeces. But our weaknesse is so succoured, which otherwise would by and by flie and fall downe, vnlesse it did sustaine it selfe with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious grieues with comfort. First how hard it is for a man to forsake and deny not only all his things, but also himselfe, let every man consider for himselfe. And yet with this introduction Christ traineth his schollers, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he so instructeth them under the discipline of the cross, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or confidence of present good things. Briefely, he so handleth them for the most part, that which way foever they turne their eies throughout the whole widespread of the world, they haue on every side nothing but despaire present before them: so that Paul faith, that we are more miserable than all men if our hope be only in this world. That they should not faine in these so great distresses, the Lord is present with them, which putte them in mind to lift vp their head higher, to cast their eies further, that they find with him the blessednes which they see not in the world. This blessednes he calleth, reward, wages, recipomence, not weyng the merite of worke, but signifying that it is a recompensing to their troubles, sufferings, flanders, &c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but that we may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a reward, because in it the Lord receieth his from labours into rest, from affliction into prosperous and happy state, from sorrow into gladnes, from pouertie into flowing wealth, from shame into glorie, and changeth all the evils which they have suffered for greater good things. So it shall also be no inconuience, if we thinke holinesse of life to be a way, not which openeth an ontte into the glory of the heavenly kingdome, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the discloasing of it: for as much as this is his good will to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. One ly let vs not imagine a correlation of merite and reward, wherein the Sophisters do fondly stick fast, because they consider not this end which we set forth. But how vnorderly is it, when the Lord calleth vs to one end, for vs to looke to another? Nothing is more evident, than that rewardes is promised to good works, to release the weakenesse of our flesh with some comfort, not to punie vp our minde with glorie. Whosoever therefore doth thereby gather the merite of works, or doth in one balance wey worke with reward, he erreth faire from the right marke of God.

Wherefore when the Scripture faith that God the just judge will one day render to his a crowne of righteousnesse: I doe not onely take exception with Augustine, and say: To whom should he being a just judge, render a crowne, if he had not being a mercifull father giuen grace? and how should there be righteousnesse, vnlesse grace went before which justifieth the vnrighteous? How should these due things be rendered, vnlesse these vnjuste things were first giuen? But also I adde another thing. How should he impute righteousnesse to our worke, vnlesse his tender mercifullnde did hide the vnrighteousnes that is in them? How should he judge them wordthie of reward, vnlesse he did by immeasurable bountifullnes take away that which is worthy of punishment? For he is wount to call eternall life, grace: because it is rendered to the free gifts of God when it is reaped to works. But the scripture doth further humble vs, and therewithall raise vs vp. For besides this that it forbiddeth vs to glory in works, because they are the free gifts of God; it there withall teacheth that they are alwaies defiled with some dregs, that they cannot satisfie God, if they be examined by the rule of his judgement: but least our courage should faint, it teacheth that they please by onely pardon. But although Augustine speaketh somewhat otherwise than we doe: yet that he doth not so disagree in the matter, shall appeare by his words in his third booke to Bonifice. Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life euen miraculously holy and perfect, the other honest in deedde and of vncurrupt manners, but not so perfect but that much wanted in him: at the last hee concluded thus. Euen this man which in manners seemeth much inferior, by reason of the true faith in God whereof he loueth and according to which he accuseth himselfe in all his offences, in all his good works praifeth God, guing to himselfe the shame, and to him glorie, and taking from himselfe both the pardon of sinnes, and the loue of woldings, when he is to be deliuered out of this life, he paffeth into the fellowship of Christ. Wherefore, but because of faith? Which although it true no man without works, (for it is, which worketh by loue, not a reproue faith) yet by it also finnes are releaft, because the righteous man liueth of faith: but without it euen the same which seeme good worke are turned into finnes. Here verily he doth plainly confesse that which we so much tranell to prose, that the righteousnesse of good works hangeth hereupon, that they are by pardon allowed of God.

6 A very neere fentre to the places aboue recited, haue these: Make to your selues friends of the Mammon of wickednesse, that when you shall fail, they may receive you into everlasting tabernacles. Command the rich men of this world not to be truly minded, nor to trust in vnuncertaine riches but in the living God, to doe well, to become rich in good worke, to lay vp in store for themselues a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good worke are compared to the riches, which we may enjoy in the blessednesse of eternall life. I answer, that we shall neuer come to the true understanding of them, vnlesse we turne our eies to the marke whereunto the holy Ghost directeth his words. If it be true which Christ faith that our mind abideth there where our treasure is, as the children of the world are wound to be earnestly bent to the getting of those things which serue for the delights of this present life: so the faithful must looke Sith they have learned that this life shall by & by vanish away like a dreame, that they send those things which which they would enjoy, thither where they shall have perfect life. We must therefore do as they do which purpose to remove into any place, where they have chosen to rest their whole life. They send their goods before, and do not discontentedly want them for a time: because they think themselves so much more happy, how much more goods they have where they shall tarie long. If we believe that heaven is our country, it behoveth vs rather to send away our riches, thither than to keep them here where we must loose them with sudden removing. But how shall we send them thither if we communicate to the necessities of the poore; so to whom whatsoever is given, the Lord accounteth it given to himself. Whereupon commeth that notable promise, He that giveth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lord. Again, he that liberally soweth, shall liberally reapeth. For those things are delivered into the hand of the Lord to keep, which are bestowed upon our brethren by the duty of charity. He, as he is a faithful keeper of that which is delivered to him, will one day restore it with plentiful gaine. Are then our dutifull doings of so great value with God, that they be as riches laide vp in store for vs in his hand? Who shall feare so to say, when the scripture doth fo oft and plainly witnessed it? But if any man will leap from the meer goodnes of God to the worthines of workes, he shall be nothing holpen by these testimonies to the establishing of his error. For you can gather nothing rightly thereof but the meer inclination of Gods tendernes toward vs: For as much as to encourage vs to well doing although the fentiues which we do to him are not worthie of so much as his only looking upon them, yet he sufficeth none of them to be loft.

7 But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when he comforteth the Thessalonicans in troubles, teacheth that the same are sent to them, that they may be accounted worthie of the kingdom of God, for which they suffer. For (faith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you: but to you, rest with vs when the Lord Iesu shall be shewed from heauen. But the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues faith, God is not unrighteous, that he should forget your works, and the love which you have shewed in his name, for that you have ministered to the Saints. To the first place I answere, that there is no worthines of merits spoken of; but because God the father willeth that we whome he hath chosen to be his children, should be made like to Christ his first begotten sonne: as it behoveth that he should first suffer, and then enter into the glorie appointed for him: to must we also by many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heauen. Therefore when we suffer tribulations for the name of Christ, there are as it were certaine marks printed upon vs, wherewith God vfheth to make the siece of his flocke. After this manner therefore we are accounted worthie of the kingdom of God, because we bear in our body the marks of our Lord and master which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make these sayings. That we bear about in our body the mortification of Iesus Christ that his life may be shewed in vs. That we be fashioned like to his sufferings, that we may come to the likeenes of his resurrection from the dead. The reason which is adioyned thereto not to prove any worthines, but to conforme the hope of the kingdom of God: as if he had said, As it agreeeth with the just judgement of God to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexatious that they have done to you, so agree it also to give you release & rest from vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it to be committ the righteousness of God not to forget the obedience of the that he is, that it declareth it to be in a manner unrighteous if he should forget them, hath this meaning: God to quicken our组织生活, hath given us assurance that the labour shall not be vaine which we shall take for his glorie. Let vs alway remember that this promise, as all other should bring vs no profit, unless the free covenent of mercie went before, whereupon the whole assurance of our salvation should rest. But standing vpon that covenant, we ought assuredly to tryst, there shall also also not want reward of the liberality of God to our workes howsoever they be unworthie. The Apostle to confirme vs in that expectation, affirmeth that God is not vnaughtie, but will stande to his promis once made. Therefore this righteounnes is rather referred to the truth of Gods promis, than to his iustice of rending due. According to which meaning there is a notable sayings of Augustine, which as the holy man sitheth not to rehearse often as notable, so I think it not unworthie that we should continually remembre it. The Lord(faith he) is faithfull, which hath made himself detter to vs, not by receiuing any thing of vs, but by promisng all things to vs.

8 There are also allaged these sayings of Paul. If I have all faith, so that I remove mountains out of their place, but have not charitie, I am nothing. Again, Now there remaine hope, faith & charitie, but the greatest among these is charitie. Againe, Above all things have charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharifees affirm that we are rather iustified by charitie than by faith, namely by the cheefe vertue, as they say. But this fond argument is easilie wiped away. For we haue in another place alreadie declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place wee also expounde of true faith, than which hee faith that charitie is greater: not that it is more mettiorous, but because it is more fruitfull, because it extendeth further, because it liberale, because it remaineth alway in force, whereas the vs of faith continueth but for a time. If we have regard to excellency, the loue of god should worthily have the cheefe place, of which Paul here speakest not. For hee enforceeth this thing only that wee should with mutuell charitie edifie one another in the Lorde, but let vs imagine that charitie doth every where excell faith: yet what man of sound judgement, yea, or of sound braine, will gather herof, that it doth more iustifie? The power of justifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthines of the work. Our iustification standeth upon the onely mercy of God and the deferring of Christ, which iustification the faith taketh hold of it, is said to iustifie. Now if you ask your aduersaries in what sense they affigne iustification to charitie, they will answer that because it is a dutifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deferring thereof righteounnes is imputed to vs by the acceptation of the goodness of God. Here you see how wel the argument proceedeth. We say that faith iustifieth, not because by the worthines of it selfe it deferrueth righteounes to vs, but because it is an instrument by which we freely obtaine the righteounes of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, and palling our Christ(wherin the sum of righteounes standeth), do affirm that we are iustified by the benefit of charitie because it excell eth aboue faith: even as if a man should reason that a king is sittifer to make a shooe then is a shoemaker, because he is an infinite way more excellent. This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sorbonicall schooles do not so much as taffe with the uttermost part of their lips what the iustification of faith is. But if any wrangler do yet carpe & ask, why in so small distance of place we take the name of faith in Paul to diuerely: I have a weightie caufe of this expostion. For thofe gifts which Paul rehearseth are after a certaine manner under faith & hope, because they pertaine to the knowledge of god, he comprehendeth them all by way of recapitulation under the name of faith & hope: as if he should say both propheticke, & toongs, & the grace and knowledge of interpretacion tend to this mark to lead vs to the knowledge of God. And we knowe God in this life none otherwise but by hope & faith. Therefore when I name faith & hope, I comprehend all these things together. And so there remaine thofe three Hope, Faith, Charitie: that is to say, how great diueritie of gifts soever there bee, they are all referred to these. Among these the chiefes is Charitie, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charitie bee the bond of perfection, then it is also the bond of righteounes which is nothing else but perfection. First, to speake nothing howe Paul there calleth perfection, when
the grace of Christ. Lib. 3.

Nothing contrarie hereunto taught by Christ in saying to a doctor of the law, swilling with a vain confidence of his works, if thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments. Mat. 19.17.

10. Art the least when they are ware of wresting the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and sophistical arguments. They caull upon this that faith is in some places called a worke, and therupon they gather that we doe wrongfully set faith as contrariety to works. As though forsooth faith in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her owne defending procure vs to righteoufneff, and not rather because by embracing the mercie of God, it stealeth in our harts the righteoufnes of Christ offered to vs of it in the preaching of the Gospell. The readers shall pardon me if I doe not tare upon confuting of such follies, for they themselues without any effort of other, are sufficiently overthrown with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the way confute one objection which seemeth to have some shew of reason, least it should trouble

9. I will not goe through all the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorbonistes rashly snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hande, and doe throwe them against vs. For, some of them are so woorthie to be laughed at, that I myselfe also cannot rehearse them vnlesse I would woorthily be counted sone. Therefore I will make an ende, when I shall have declared the sayings of Christ, wherewith they summariously pleafeth themselves. For, to the lawyer which asked him what was necessary to saluation, he answered: if thou wilt enter into life keep the commandments. What would we more (say they) when we are commandted by the author of grace himfelfe to get the kingdom of God by the keeping of his commandements? As though forsooth it were not certaine, that Christ tempered his answers to them with whom he faw that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the law asketh of the meane to obtaine blessedneffe, and not that onely, but with doing of what thing men may attaine unto it. Both the perfons of him that spake and the question which led the Lord so to answer, The Lawyer being filled with the preservation of the righteoufneffe of the lawe, was blinde in confidence of works. Again, he sought nothing else but what were the works of righteoufneffe, by which saluation is gotten. Therefore he is woorthily sent to the lawe, in which there is a perfect mirrour of righteoufneffe. We also doe with a loude voice pronounce that the commandments must be kept, if life be sought in worke. And this doctrine is necessary to be knowne of Christians. For how should they flee to Christ if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the headlong downfall of death? But how should they understand how farre they have strayed from the way of life, vnlesse they first understand what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the sanctuarie to recover saluation is in Christ, when they see how great difference there is between their life and the righteoufneffe of God which is contained in the keeping of the lawe. The summe is this, that if saluation be sought in worke, we must kepe the commandements by which we are instructed to perfect righteoufneffe. But we must not sticke fast here, vnlesse we will faint in our mid course: for none of us is able to kepe the commandements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteoufneffe of the lawe, we must of necessite reftort to another helpe, namely to the faith of Christ. Wherefore as here the Lord calleth backe the doctor of the lawe, whom he knew to swell with vain confidence of works, to the law, whereby he may learne that he is a stupen subiect to the dreadfull judgement of eternal death: so in other places, without making mention of the lawe, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to me all yee that labour and are loaded, and I will refresh you, and ye shall finde rest for your foules.

Mat. 11.30.

trouble some that are not so well practised. Sth common reason teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular sinnes are imputed to vs for vnrighteousness, they say it is meeke that to all particular good works be given the praise of righteousness. They do not satisfie me which answer, that the damnation of men properly proceedeth from one vnbeleeue, not from particular sins. I doeindeed agree to them, that vnbeleeue is the fountain and roote of all sinns. For it is the first departing from God, after which do follow the particular trespassings against the lawe. But whereas they seeke to set one felte-same reason of good and euill works in weying of righteounses or vnrighteounses, therein I am compelled to disgree from them.

For the righteounses of works is the perfect obedience of the lawe. Therefore thou canst not be righteous by works, vnleefe thou doe followe it as a straight line in the whole continual course of thy life. From it so soone as thou haft sworn thou art fallen into vnrighteounses. Herby appeareth that righteounses commeth not of one or a few works, but of an vnswaring and vnweared obteruing of the will of God. But the rule of judging vnrighteounses is most contrary. For hee that hath committed fornication, or hath stollen, is by one offence guiltie of death, because hee hath offended against the maiestie of God. Therefore these our little arguers doe stumble, for that they marke not this saying of James, that he which sinneth in one, is made guiltie of all, because hee that hath forbidden to kill, hath also forbidden to steale, &c. Therefore it ought to seem no absurditie, when we saie that death is the just reward of euery sin; because they are euery one worthie of the just displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather that by one good worke man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnen deserveth his wrath.

The xix. Chapter.

Of Christiann libertie.

Now we must entreate of Christiann libertie: the declaration wherof hee must not omit whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgement the summe of the doctrine of the Gospell. For it is a thing principally necessarie, and without the knowledge whereof confidences dare in a manner enterpris nothing without doubting, they stumble and start backe in many things, they alway stagger and tremble: but especially it is an appendant of justification, and as it were a little to the understanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly fear God, shall hereby receive an incomparabe fruit that doctrine which the wicked and Lucianicall men doe pleasantly taunt with their scoffes, because in the spiritual darkness where with they be taken, every wanton railing is lawfull for them. Wherefore if that now come sooth in fit season: and it was profitable to differre to this place the plainer discourse of it, (for we have already in diverse places lightly touched it) because so soone as any mention is brought in of Christiann libertie, then either filthie lusts do Boyle, or mad motions do rise, vnleefe these wanton words be timely met withall, which do otherwise most naufully corrupt the best things. For some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and breake sooth into an unbridled licentiousnes, and some men disdaine it, thinking that by it all moderation, order and choice of things is taken away. What should we heere do, being compassed in such narrow straites? Shall we bid Christiann libertie farewell, and so cutte off all fit occasion for such perills? But, as we have saide, vnleefe that bee fafte holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly known. Rather we must endeavour that so necessarie a part of doctrine be not supprest, and yet that in the meantime those fonde objections may be mette withall which are wouent to rise thereupon.
2. Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three partes. The first, that the cosciences of the faithfull, when the assiance of their injustification before God is to be sought, may raise and advance themselues above the lawe, and forget the whole righteousnesse of the lawe. For if the lawe (as we have already in another place declared) lease no man righteous: either we are excluded from all hope of injustification, or we must be loosed from the lawe, and so that there be no regard at all had of works. For who thinke that he must bring somewhat be it never so little of good works to obtaine righteousnesse, he cannot appoint any ende or measure of them, but maketh himselfeetter to the lawe. Therefore taking away all mention of the lawe, and laying aside all thinking upon works, we must embrace the only mercy of God, when we intreat of injustification: and turning away our sight from our felues, we must behold Christ alone. For there the question is not how we be righteous: but how although we be unrighteous and vnworthie, we be taken for worthie. Of which thing if cosciences will attaine any certaintie, they must give no place to the lawe. Neither can any man hereby gather that the lawe is superfluous to the faith-full, whom it doth not therfore cease to teach, & exhort, & pricks forward to goodnes, although before the judgement seat of God it hath no place in their cosciences.
For these two things, as they are most divers, so mutt they bee well and diligently distinguished of vs. The whole life of Christians ought to be a certaine meditation of godlineesse, because they are called into sanctification. Herein standeth the office of the lawe, that by putting them in minde of their duty, it should shew them vp to the endeavour of holinesse and innocencie. But when cosciences are careful how they may have God mercifull, what they shall answere, and vpon what assiance they shall stand if they be called to his judgemen, there is not to be reckned what the lawe requereth, but only Christ must be set forth for righteousness, which passeth all perfection of the lawe.

4. Vpon this point hangeth almost all the argument of the Epistle to the Gal-thians. For, that they be fond expounders which teach that Paul there contendeth only for the libertie of ceremonies, may be proved by the places of the arguments. Or which sort are these. That Christ was made a curse for vs, that he might redeeme vs from the Curse of the lawe. Again, Stand fast in the libertie where with Christ hath made you free, and be not againe entangled with the yoke of bondage. Beholde, I Paul say, if ye be circumcised, Christ shall nothing profit you. And he which is circumcised is better of the whole lawe. Christ is made idle to you who putte yee be that are afflicted by the lawe: ye are fallen away from grace. Wherein truly is contained some higher thing than the libertie of ceremonies. I graunt in deed, that Paul there intreateth of ceremonies, because he contendeth with the false Apostles, which were about to bring againe into the Christian Church the old shadowes of the law which were abolished by the comming of Christ. But for the disquietting of this que-tion, there were higher places to be disputd in which the whole controversie stood.
First because by those Jewish shadowes the brightnesse of the Gospel was darkened, he sheweth that we haue in Christ a full givind in deed of all thofe things which were shadowed by the ceremonies of Moses. Secondly, because these deceivers filled the people with a most strange opinion, namely, that this obedience asauled to de-ferve the favours of God. Here he standeth much vpon this point, that the faithfull should not thinke that they can by any works of the lawe, much less by those little principles, obtaine righteousness before God. And therewithall he teacheth, that they are by the crose of Christ free from the damnation of the law, which otherwise hangeth over all men, that they shouldde with full assurednesse rest in Christ alone.
Which place properly pertaineth to this purpose. Last of all he maintaineth to the consciencies of the faithfull, their libertie, that they should not be bound with any religion in things necessarie.
4. The second part, which hangeth upon that former part, is that conscience obey the law, not as compelled by the necessity of the law: but being free from the yoke of the law it fell, of their own accord they obey the will of God. For because they abide in perpetual errors, so long as they be under the dominion of the law, they shall never be with cheerful and sute framed to the obedience of God, unless they first have this liberty given them. By an example we shall both more briefly, and more plainly perceive what these things meane. The commandement of the law is, that we love our God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strengths. That this may be done, our soule must first bee made void of all other sense and thought, our heart must be cleansed of all defiles, all our strengths must be gathered vp and drawn together to this onely purpose. They which have gone most farre before other in the way of the Lord, are yet very farre from this mark. For though they love God with their minde, and with syncre affection of heart, yet they have still a great part of their heart and soule possetled with the defiles of the flesh, by which they are drawn backe and staid from going forward with hastie course to God. They doe in deed trauell forward with great endevour: but the flesh partly feeleth their strengths, and partly draweth them to it selfe. What shall they here doe, when they feele that they doe nothing lefse then performe the lawe? They will, they couet, they endevour, but nothing with such perfection as ought to be. If thou looke vpon the lawe, they see that whatsoever workes they attempt or purpose, is accursed. Neither is there any cause why any man should deceive himselfe with gathering that the worke is therefore not altogether cuil, because it is vnperfect: and therefore that God doth nevertheless accept that good which is in it. For, the law requiring perfect love, condemneth all imperfection vnlesse the rigour of it be mitigated. Therefore his works should fall to nought which he would have to semne partly good and he shall finde that it is a transgression of the law, cuen in this because it is vnperfect.

5. Loe, how all our works are subject to the curse of the lawe, if they be measured by the rule of the lawe. But howe shoulde then vnhappy soules cheerfully applice themselues to worke, for which they might not trouth that they could get any thing but curfe? On the other side, if being deliuered from this seuer eacting of the lawe, or rather from the whole rigour of the lawe, they heare that they be called of God with fatherly gentleneffe: they will merily and with great cheerfulnesse answere his calling and follow his guiding. In a flame, they which are bound to the yoke of the lawe, are like to bondefuants, to whom are appointed by their lords certaine tasks of worke for euery day. These fuants thinke that they have done nothing, nor dare come in the sight of their Lords, vnlesse they have performed that full task of their works. But children, which are more liberally and more freemane handled of their fathers, tichie not to present to them their begne and halfe vnperfect works, yea and those having some fault, trusting that they will accept their obedience and willingnesse of minde, although they have not exactly done so much as their good will was to do. So must we be as may have fire affiancie, that our obediencies shall be allowed of our most kinde father, how little fouer, and how rude and vnperfect fouer they be. As also he assureth vs by the Prophet: I will spare them (faith he) as the father is woont to spare his fonne that serueth him. Where this word Spare, is fet for to beare withall, or gently to wink at faults, for as much as he also maketh mention of service. And this affiancie is not a little necessarie for vs, without which we shall goe about all things in vaine. For God will not hime selfe to be worshipp with no worke of ours but which is truly done of vs for the worshipp of him. But how can that be done among these terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worshipp without our worke?

6. And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, referreth al the good works which are read of in the holy fathers, to faith, and weeth them only by by faith. Touching this libertie there is a place in the Epistle to the Romans, where Paul reasoneth that sinne ought not to have dominion ouer vs, because wee are not ynder the law, but ynder grace. For when hee had exhorted the faithfull that sinne should not reigne in their mortall bodies, and that they should not give their members to be weapons of wickednes to sinne, but should dedicate themselues to God, as they that are alive for the dead, & their members, weapons of righteounesse to God:
and whereas they might on the other side obiect that they doe yet carrie with them the fith full of lusts, and that sin dwelleth in them, hee adioyneth that comfort by the libertie of the law, as if he should say. Though they doe not yet throughly feele sinne destroyed and that righteounesse yet liueth not in them, yet there is no caufe why they should feare and be discouraged as though he had beene alway displeased with them for the remnants of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the lawe, that their worke should not bee examined by the rules of the lawe. As for them that gather that wee may sinne because wee are not ynder the lawe, let them knowe that this libertie pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encour-gage vs to good.

7 The third part is, that we be bound with no conscience before God of outward things which are by themselues indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime vs them, and sometime leave them vnused. And the knowledge of this libertie also is very necessarie for vs, for if it shall be absent, there shall be no quiet to our con-sciences, no end of superstitions. Many at this day do thinke vs fond to mooue disputation about the free eating of flesh, about the free vs of daies, and garments, & such other small trifes as they indeed thinke the: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when confciences have once cast themselves into the fiare, they enter into a long and cumbesome way, from whence they can afterward finde no easie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether he may occu-pie linnen in theetees, shirts, handkerchiefes, and napkins, neither will he bee out of doubt whether he may vs hempe, and at the last he will also in doubt of matters, for he will wey with himselfe whether hee cannot sup without napkins, whether hee may not be without handkerchiefes. If any man thinke deince meate to be vnlawfull, at length he shall not with quiemes before the Lorde eate either browne-bread or common meates, when he remembretth that he may yet sustaine his bodie with ba-fer food. If he doubt of pleasent wine, afterward he will not vske dead wine with good peace of conscience, latt of all he will not be so bold to touch sweeter & cleanner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it un-lawfull(as the common saying is) to tread uppon a straw lying a croffe. For here is begun no light strife, but this is in question, whether God will haue vs to vs these or those thinges, whose will ought to guide all our counsels and doings. Hereby some must needs be caried with desperation into a conteste devouring pit: some must, delping God, and casting away his feare, make themselves aware through destruction when they have no ready way: For who soever are entangled with such doubting, which way to euer they tumne themselues, they bee euery where present offcence of conscience.

8 I know (faith Paul) that nothing is common(meaning by common vnhoile) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which wordes hee makest all outewarde things subjicet to our libertie, provided alway that our minides have the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitions opinion cast into vs any doubt, those things which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to vs. Wherefore he addeth: blessed is he that judgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if the eate, is condemned, because hee eath not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sin. Among such narrow straites, whoo neuerbelieffe with carelessly venturing on all thinges thewe themselues boulder, do they
Cap. 19. Of the manner how to receive not a sufiice turne themselves away from God? But they which are throughly pierced with some fear of God, when they themselves also are compelled to do many things against their conscience, are encouraged and do fall downe with feare. All that are such, doe receive none of the gifts of God with thanksgiving, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our vse. I mean the thanksgiving that proceedeth from a hart that acknowledgeth the liberality & goodness of God in his gifts. For many of them indeed do understand that those are the benefits of God which they vse, & they praise God in his works: but such are not persuaded that they are given to themselves, how should they thanke God as the giver of them? Thus in a summe we see, whether this libertie tendeth, namely that we should vse the benefits of God to such vse as he hath given them unto vs, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of minde, by which conscience our soules may both have peace with him, and acknowledge his liberality toward vs. For these are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be observed, that our conscience should not be bound with any necessity to keepe them, but should remember that the vse of them is by God's beneficence subject to themselves vnsed vse, & therefore 9 But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spiritual thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing of fearfull conscience before God, if either they bee vnquieten, or carefull for the forgiveness of sinnes, or whether or not they be persuaded whether our imperfect works and desilets with the faults of our flesh please God, or whether they be troubled about the vse of indifferent things. Wherefore they doe wrongfullly expounde it, which either doe make it a cloke for their owne desires, that they may abuse the benefits of God to their own luft, or which do thinke that that is libertie, but that which is vse before men, and therefore in us it have no regarde of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men doe at this day much offende. There is almost no man which may by his abilitie of weale be fumptuous, which delecteth not in ezccllive gorgiousneffe, in furniture of bankets, in apparel of bodie, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excel other in all kind of statelineffe; which doth not marcellously flatter himselfe in his sinenes. And all these things are defended vnder the pretence of Christian libertie. They say, that they are things indifferent, I grant, that a man indifferentely vse them. But when they are too greedily couered, when they are proudly boasted, when they are wastfully spent, it is certaine that those things, which otherwise were of themselves lawful, are by these faults desiled: This sayeing of Paul doth very well put difference betwene things indifferent. All things are vse to the clean: but to the desiled and vnbelieuing, nothing is vse, because their mind and conscience is desiled. For why are accurd the rich men, they which haue their comfort, which are satisfied with meate, which do now laugh, which sleepe in beds of iuorie, which ioyne lande to land, whose bankets haue Lute, Harpe, taber, and wine? Verily both iuorie, and gold, and riches, are the good creatures of God, permitted ye and appointed by the providence of God for men to vse. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meate, or to ioyne new possesions to their owne olde possesions or of their auncetters, or to be desiled with musicall melodie, or to drinke wine. This is true indeed. But when they have plenty of things, to wallow in delights, to glut themselves, to make their wit and minde drunke with present pleasures and alway no gape for new, these doings are most farre from the lawfull vse of the gifts of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wasting, let them take away vanity and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely vse the benefits of God, When the minde shall be framed to this sobriety, they shall haue a rule of the lawfull vse. On the other side let this moderation bee wanting, even base and common delights are too much. For this is truly said, that of ten times in frise and course cloth dwelleth a purple heart and sometime vnderlike and.

and purple, lyeth simple humility. Let every man in his degree live either poorely, or meanely, or plentifully, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: and let them thinke, that this is the law of Christian liberty: if they have learned with Paul to be contented with those things which they presently haue: if they can skill both to be humble and to excelle: if they be taught in all places and in all things to be both full and hungry, to haue plentie and to suffer want.

10. Herein also many men doe errre, because as though their libertie should not be found and saie vnlesse it had men wittnesse of it, they doe vn diferently and vnwisely ve it. By which vnfeatable vnsing, they many times offend the weak brethen. Yea, thou may see at this day some, which thinke that their libertie can not stand, vnlesse they take pooffession of it by eating of flesh on Friday. I blame not that they eate: but this false opinion must be driven out of their mindes. For they ought to thinke that by their libertie they obtaine no new thing in the sight of men but before God, and that it standeth as well in abstaining as in vnsing. If they understand that it maketh no matter before God, whether they eate flesh or egges, whether they weare red or black garments, that is enough. The conscience is now free, to which the benefit of such libertie was due. Therefore although they doe afterward abstaine at their life long from flesh, and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no leffe free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience abstaine. But they doe most hurtfully offende because they nothing regard the weakenesse of their brethren, which we ought so to beare with, that we raillly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime also it behooueth that our libertie be fet forth before men. And this I grant. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake of whom the Lord hath so earnestly gyuen vs charge.

11. I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon we may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that common division, which teacheth that there is of offences one fort gien, another taken: for asmuch as it both hath a plaine testimony of the Scripture, and doth not vnfitly express that which it meaneth. If thou doe any thing by vnfeasionable lightnesse, or wantonnesse, or rashnes, not in order, not in his place, whereby the ignorant and weake are offended, that same may be called an offence gien by thee: because it came to paffe by thy fault that such offence was stirr'd vp. And it is always called an offence gien in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not euilly done nor out of time is by euill will or by some wrongfull maliciousnes of mind drawn to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence gien, but these wrongfull construers doe without cause take one. With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weake: but with this second kinde sowre natures & Pharisical scornefull heads are offended. Wherefore we shall call the one, the offence of the weake: the other of the Pharisies: and we shall so temper the vs of our libertie, that it ought to give place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigoroussnesse of the Pharisies. For, what is to be yielded to weakenes, Paul the weath in very many places. Beare (faith he) the weake in Faith. Again, Let vs not hereafter judge one another. But this rather, let there not be laid before our brother any offence or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to the same intent, which are more fit to be read in the place it selfe, than to be here rehearsed. The fumme is, that we which are strong should beare with the weakenesse of our brethren, and not pleaue our selues, but every one of vs please his neighbour unto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie be not in any wise an offence to them that are weake. Again, Eate ye all things that are sold in the thambles, asking no question for conscience:
Cap. 19. Of the manner how to receive

Conscience: of your conscience (I say) not another man's. Finally be ye such, that ye give no offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Greeks, nor to the Church of God. Also in another place, Ye are called, brethren, into libertie: only give not your libertie to be an occasion to the flesh, but by charitie secure ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not given towarde our weake neighbours, whose seruants charitie maketh vs in all things: but rather, that having peace with God in our minds, we may also live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharisees, how much it is to be regarded, we learne by the words of the Lord, whereby he bidde them to be let alone, because they are blind, and guides of the blind. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

12 But yet still the matter hangeth doubtfull, vntil we know who are to be taken for weake, and who for Pharisees: which difference being taken away, I see not among offences what we at all of libertie remaineth, which might never bee vsed without great danger. But it seemeth to me that Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to be tempered or to bee defended though with offences. When he tooke Timothee into his companie, he circumcised him: but he could not be brought to circumcise Titus. Heere were divers doings, and no change of purpose or of minde: namely in circumcising Timothee, when he was free from all men, he made himselfe a seruant to all men: and he was made to the Jews, as a Jew, that he might win the Iewes: to them that were vnder the lawe, as if he himselfe were vnder the lawe, that he might winne them which were vnder the lawe: all things to all men, that he might save many, as he were in another place. Thus we have a right moderation of libertie, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What he had respect unto, when hee stely refuseth to circumcise Titus, he himselfe refuseth, writing thus: But neither was Titus, which was with me, although he was a Grecian compell'd to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had prudly crept in to espie our libertie which we have in Christ Iesus, that they might bring vs into bondage, to whom we gave not place by subiection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when we must of necessity defend our libertie, if the same be in weake consciences endangered by the vnjust exactings of false Apollines. We must in every thing studie to preferre charitie, and have regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (saith he) are lawfull for me, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawfull for me, but all things do not edifie. Let no man seeke that which is his owne, but that which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, then that we must vsue our libertie, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbour: but if it be not so expedient for our neighbour, then we must forbear it. There be some which counterfet the wisdome of Paul in forbearing of libertie, while they do nothing lesse than apply the same to the duties of charitie. For so that they may persuade for their owne quietnes, they with all mention of libertie to be buried, whereas it is no lesse behoefull for our neighbours, sometime to vsue libertie for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to require it for their commodities. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therefore granted him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charitie.

13 But whatsoever I have spoken of avoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For those things that are necessary to be done, are not to be left undone for feare of any offence. For as our libertie is to be submited to charitie, so charitie itselfe is to be vnder the puresse of faith: Verily heere also ought to be had regard of charitie, but so farre as to the altars, that is, that for our neighbours sake we offend not God. Their incemperance... is not to be allowed, which doe nothing but with trouble some turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to rend all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkned to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand sortes of vn-godlinesse, yet doe faine that they must behauve them selves so that they be none of fervice to their neighbors. As though they doe not in the meane edifie the confciences of their neighbours to euill, specially whereas they sticke faft in the fame mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleasan men forsooth, whether their neighbour to be instructed with doctrine or example of life, say that he must be fed with milke, whom they fill with most euill and poynous opinions. Paul reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Maiffe had then been among them, would he have sacrificed to give them the drinke of milke? No: For milke is not poynson. Therefore they lie in saying that they feede them whom vnder a thew of flattering allurements they cruelly kill. But granting that such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they feede their children with milke? For if they never grow bigger, that they may at the leaft be able to bear some light meate, it is certaine that they were never brought vp with milke. There are two reasons that mooue me why I doe not now more sharply contends with them: first, because their follies are scarcely worthy to be confuted, fith they worthily feme miltie in the sight of all men that have their sound wit: Secondly, because I have sufficiently done it in peculiar bookes. I will not now doe a thing alreadie done. Onely, let the readers remember this, that with whatsoever offences Satan and the world goe about to turne vs away from the ordinances of God, or to stay vs fr0 following that which he appointeth, yet we must not efcape goe earnestly forward: and then, that whatsoever dangers hang upon it, yet is it not at our libertie to warrue one hauing breadth from the comman读懂 of the fame God, neither is it lawfull by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giueth vs leave.

14 Now therefore fith faithfull conferences having received such prerogative of libertie as we have above fet forth, have by the benefite of Christ obtained this, that they be not entangled with any shares of obseruations in those things in which the Lord willed that they should be at libertie: We conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is vnmeete, that either Christ should lose the thanke of his fo great liberality, or confciences their profite. Neither ought we to thinke it a flight matter, which we see to haue cost Christ fo deere: namely which he valued not with gold or siluer, but with his owne blood: So that Paul silketh not to say, that his death is made vsode, if we yeeld our foules into subjection to men. For he transeleth about nothing else in certaine Chapters of the Epistle to the Galathians, but to shew that Christ is darkned or rather destroyed to vs, by our confciences fande faft in their libertie, which verily they haue loft if they may at the wil of men be shared with the bonds of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthie to be knowne, so it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For so ioone as any word is spoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by and by great troubles are raised vp partly by seditious men, partly by flaunderers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and ouerthrown.

15 Therefore that none of vs may fumble at this stone, first let vs consider, that there are two sortes of government in man: the one spiritual, whereby the confciences is framed to godlines and to the worship of God: the other euill, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanity and cuillity which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not vneuen names called the Spiritual and Temporall jurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of the two sortes of government pertaineth to the life of the Soule, and the latter is occupied in the things of this present life: not onely in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spend his life among men holyly, honestly, and soberly. For, that first kindle hath place in the inward minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behauiours. The one we may call the spirituall kingdome, the other, the Ciuill kingdome. But these two, as wee haue diuided them, must be either of them alway severally considered by themselves, and when the one is in considering, we must withdrawe and tune away our mindes from the thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two wordes, which both diuers kings and diuers lawes may govene. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spirituall libertie, we shall not wrongfully draw to the ciuill order, as though Christianis were according to the outwaerd gouernement lsette fubiect to the lawes of men, because their confciences are at libertie before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Againe, because euene in those ordinances which seeme to pertaine to the spirituall kingdome, there may be some error, wee must also put difference betweene thefe, which are to be taken for lawfull as agreeable to the word of God, & on the other side which ought not to haue place among the godly. Of the Ciuill gouernement there shall be elde where place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiasticall lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entretaining of it shall be fit for the fourth booke, where we shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I have faide) of it selue not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accumber many, because they do not sufficiently enough put difference between the outward court as they call it, and the court of conscience. Moreover this encreaeth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not onely for feare of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that confciences are also bound by the ciuill lawes. If it were so, all should come to naught which we both haue spoken and shall speake of the spirituall gouernement. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to know what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to be fetched from the derivation of the word. For, as when men do with minde and understanding conceiue the knowledge of things, they are thereby faide (Seire) to knowe, whereupon also is derived the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they have a feeling of the judgement of God, as a witness joyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes but that they be drawn accused to the judgement of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man, because it suffereth not man to suppress in himselfe that which he knoweth but putteth him so far till it bring him to guiltines. This is it which Paul meaneth, where he faith that conscience doth together witnes with men, when their thoughts doe accuse or acquite them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remain as enclosed within man. Therefore this feeling which presentheth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keeper joyned to man, to mark and espie all his secretes, that nothing may remaine buried in darknes. Whereupon also commeth that olde Proverbe, Conscience is a thousand witness. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for the quietnes of minde, when being persuaded of the grace of Christ, we do without feare present our felues before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, setteth to have no more conscience of sin, in stead of, to bee deliuered or acquited that same may no more accuse vs.

Therefore as works haue respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is nothing else but the inward pureness of the heart. In which sense Paul wrieth that charitie is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not faineing. Afterward also in the same chapter he wrieth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwrecke from the faith, because they had forsaken good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth that is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere endeuer to live holyly and godlyly. Sometime, God sometimes in deed it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endeavoured himselfe to walke with a good conscience towards God & men. But this was therefore said, because the fruits of good conscience do flowe and come even to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God only, as I have already said. Hereby it commeth to passe that the law is said to bind the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without having any consideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not only to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbiddeth all manner of filthynesse of words and outward wantonnes whatsoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conscience is subject although there liued not one man in the world. So he that behaueth himself intertemperately, not only sinneth in this that he giueth an euil example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bound with guiltines before God. In things that are of themselves meanes, there is another consideration. For we ought to abstaine from them if they breede any offence, but the conscience stille being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh concrast to Idols. If anie (faith he) move any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man should shew, which being first warned should nevertheless eate such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it is necessarie for him to abstaine as it is prescrb'd of God, yet he ceaseth not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Thus we see how this lawe binding the outward worke, leaueth the conscience vnbound.

The xx. Chapter.

Of Prayer, which is the chiefe exercize of faith, and whereby we daily receiv the benefits of God.

O f these things that have been hitherto spoken, we plainly perceiue how needy and voide man is of all good things, and how he wanteth all helps of saluation. Wherefore if he seek for releaøe whereby he may succour his neediness, he must go out of himselfe and get them eft where. This is afterward declared unto vs, that the Lord doth of his owne free will and liberally give himselfe to vs in his Chrift, in whom he offereth vs in stead of our miserie all felicitie, in stead of our neede wealthie, in whom he openeth to vs the heauenly treaures: that our whole faith shoulde beholde his beloued sonne, that vpon him our whole expectation shoulde hang, in him our whole hope shoulde flocke and rest. This verily is the secret and hidden Philosophie, which cannot be wrung out with Logike all arguments: but they learne it whose eies God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that we are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatsoever we have neede of, whatsoever wanteth in vs, the same is in God and in our Lord Iesu Christ, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulnie of his largesse to rest, that from thence we shoulde all drawe as out of a most plentiful fountaine: now it remaineth that we secke in him, and with prayers craue of him that which we have learned to be in him. Otherwise to know God to be the Lord and giuer of all good things, which allureth us to pray to him, and not to gooe to him and pray to him: should so nothing profite vs, that it should be all one as if a man should neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle to shewe that true faith cannot bee idle from calling upon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospele springeth faith, so by it our harts are framed to call vpon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a little before said, that the spirit of adoption, which seal'd us in our harts the wittes of the Gospele, raiseth vp our spirits that they dare shewe forth their desires to God, firre vp unspeakable gronings, and cri with confidence Abba Father. It is meete therefore that this last point, because it was before but onely spoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, should now be more largely entreated of.

Rom.8,16.
By prayer we are both enriched with grace, and disquieted in distress.

This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that we attain to those riches which are laid up for us with the heavenlie father. For there is a certaine communicati cating of men with God, whereby they entering into the sanctuary of heaven, do in his owne presence call to him touching his promises: that the same thing which they beleued him affirming only in word not to be vaine, they may when needed require and finde in experience. Therefore we see that there is nothing set forth to vs to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which we are not also commanded to crave with prayers: so true it is that by prayer are digged vp the treasures, which our faith hath looked vpon being shewed to it by the gospell of the Lord. Now how necessary and how manifold profitable this exercise of prayer is, it can by no words be sufficiently declared. Undoubtedly it is not without cause that the heavenlie father testifieth, that the only forces of salvation is in the calling vpon his name, namely whereby we call to vs the presence both of his prudence, by which he watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which he suffitaineth vs being weak and in a manner fainting: and of his goodnes, by which he receieth vs into favour being miserably loaden with sinnes: finally whereby we call him all whole, to give himself present to vs. Hereby growth singular rest and quietness to our consciences. For when we have disclosed to the Lord the necessitie which distressed vs, we largely rest though it were but in this onely that none of our enuis is hidden from him, whom we are persuaded both to be most well willing toward vs, and most able to provide well for vs.

But (will some man say) did not he know without any to put him in mind of it, both in what part we are distressed, and what is expedient for vs: so that it may seeme after a certaine manner superfluos, that he should be troubled with our prayers, as though he winked or slept, vn珠三角 he were awaked with our voice? But they which so reason, marke not to what end the Lord hath instructed them that he his to pray: for he ordained it not so much for his owne cause as rather for ours. He willeth in deed, as right it is, that his due be renderd to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatsoever men require or do perceive to make for their profite, and do testify the same with wishings. But the profite also of this sacrifice wherewith he is worshipped, commeth to vs. Therefore how much more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselves and other of the benefits of God, so much the more sharpely they were pricked forward to pray. The onely example of Elias shall be enough for vs, which being sure of the counsell of God, after that he not rashly had promised rain to Ahab, yet busily prayeth betwene his knees, and tendereth his servant seven times to elipte it: not for that he did disdaine the oracle of God, but because he knew that it was his duty, least his faith should waxe drowse and sluggish, to lay vp his desires with God. Wherefore although while we be senselesse and so dull that we perceive not our owne miseries, he watcheth and watcheth for vs, and sometime also helpeth vs undesired, yet it much behoovth vs, that he be continually called vpon of vs, that our heart may be enflamed with earnest and fervent desire to seeke, loue, and worship him, while we accustome ourselves in every necessitie to flee to him as to our shooete-anchor. Againe, that no desire and no work at all may enter into our mind, whereof we should be ashamed to make him witnesse, while we learne to present our wishes, yea and to poure out our whole heart before his eyes. Then that we may be framed to receive all his benefits with true thankfulnes of mind, yea and with outward thanksgiving, of which we are put in mind by our prayer that they come to vs from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which we desired, being persuaded that he hath answered to our prayers, we may be thereby the more generally called to think vp his kindness, and there withall embrace with greater pleasure those things which we acknowledge to have bene obtained by prayer. Last of all, that verie vie and experience may according to the measure of
of our weaknesses assure our minds of his prudence when we understand that he not only promiseth that he will never fail us, and that he doth of his own accord open vs the entic to call him in the very point of necessity, but also hath his hand always stretched out to help them that be his, and that he doth not feed them with words but defendeth them with present help. For these causes, the most kind Father, although he never sleepeth or is sluggish, yet oftentimes maketh a show as though he slept and were sluggish, that so he may exercise vs, which are otherwise slothful and sluggish to come to him, to ask of him, to require him to our own great benefit. Therefore they do too foolishly, which to call away the minds of men from prayer, babble that the prudence of God, which maketh for the safekeeping of all things, is in vain wearied without callings upon him : Whereas the Lord contrariwise not in vain testifieth that he is nigh to all them that call upon his name in the truth. And of none other sort is that which other do triply lay, that it is superfluous to ask those things which the Lord is of his own will ready to give: whereas even the very name things which flowe to vs from his own free liberality, he will haue vs acknowledge to be granted to our prayers. Which thing that notable sentence of the Psalm doth testifie, wherewith many like sayings do accord. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are unto their prayers. Which saying to feteth out the prudence of God bent of his own accord to provide for the faith of the godly, that yet he omiteth not the exercise of faith, whereby slothfulness is wiped from the minds of men. The eyes of God therefore do wake, that he may succour the necessity of the blind: but he will againe on our behalfe heare our gronings, that he may the better prooue his love toward vs. And so both are true, that the watchman of Israel sleepe not; nor slumbereth, and yet that he fitteth still as having forgotten us when he seemeth vs dull and dume.

4. Now to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the first rule, that we be otherwise framed in minde and heart, then becommeth them that enter into talk with God. Which verily we shall attaine as touching the minde, if the same be free from fleshly cares and thoughts wherein it may be called away or withdrawn from the right and pure beholding of God, do not only bend it selue wholly to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted vp and carried about it selue. Neither do I here require a mind so at libertie, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the conscientiousness of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in vs (as we see that the holy servants of God do sometime declare great torments, much more carefulnesse, when they say they vnto the Lord a bawling voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the midst of the iawes of death.) But I say that all strange and foraine cares must be druen away, wherewith the minde it selue wandering hither and thither is carried about, and being drawn out of heauen is presed downe to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted vp above it selue, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those things which our blinde and foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selue bound within the compass of her owne vanitie, but rise vp to purenesse worthie for God.

5. Both these things are specially worthie to be noted, that whosoever prepareth himselfe to pray, should thereto applye all his senses and endeavours, and not (as men are wont) be diversely drawn with wandering thoughts: because there is nothing more contrarie to the reverence of God, than such lightheas which is a witness of too wanston licentiousnesse and loose from all feare. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour as we find it more hard. For no man can be bent so to praze, but that he shall finde many bythoughts to crepe upon him, either to breake his bowing and sworne to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let vs call to mind, how great an unworthiness it is, whc God receueth vs into familiar talk with him, to abuse his so great gentilenesse, with mingling bohte and prophane things together,

Together, when the reverence of him holdeth not our minde fast bounde vnto him: but as if we talked with some meane man, we do in the midst of our praire, forsaking him, leape hither and thither. Let vs therefore knowe that none doe rightly and well prepare themselfes to praire, but they whom the majestie of God pearceeth, that they come to it vncompassed of earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremonie of lifting vp of handes, that men should remember that they bee farre distant from God, vnlesse they lift vp their sences on high. As also it is saide in the Psalm. To thee have I lifted vp my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes with this maner of speech, to lift vp praire: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not sit still in their drags. Let this be the flamme: that how much more liberally God dealeth with vs, gently alluring vs to unloade our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we vnlesse he is so excellent and incomparable benefite doe with vs overwey all other things and drave vs vnto it selfe, that we may earnestly apply our endeavours and sences to pray: which cannot be done vnlesse our minde by strongly wraffling with the hinderances doe rise vp aboue them. Another point we haue set forth, that we aske no more than God giueth leave. For though he biddeth vs to pour out our harts, yet he doth indifferently giue loose reines to foolish and foirward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the will of the godly, he proceedeth not to tender bearing with them that he submitteth himselfe to their will. But in both these points men doe commonly much offend. For not only the most part of men presume without shame, without reverence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelesly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreame: but also so great foolishnesse or leffe leffe dulenesse possesteth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, euen all their most filthie desires, whereof they would greatly be ashamed to make men pruie. Some profligate men haue laughed to their faces, yea and detested this boldnesse, yet the vice it self hath alway reigned. And whereby it came to passe that ambitious men haue chosen Jupiter to be their Patron: courteous men, Mercurius: the desirous of learning, Apollo and Minerva:warriers, Mars: and lecherous folk, Venus. Like as at this day (as I haue euen now touched) men doe in praiers graunt more licence to their vnlawfull desires, than when they sparingly talk with there egals: But God suffereth not his gentleness to be so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our praiers subject to his authoritie, and restraineth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this laying of John. This is our affiance, that if we ask any thing according to his will: he heareth vs. But for as much as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe so great perfection, we must seek a remedie to help vs. As wee ought to bendeth the light of our minde to God, so the affection of the hart ought also to followe to the same ende. But both doe stand farre beneth it, yea rather doe faint and faille or bee caried a contrarie waie. Wherefore God to succour this weaknesse, in our praiers giueth the spirite to be our scholemaster, to instruct vs what is right, and to governe our affections. For, because we know not what we ought to praye as we ought, the spirite commeth to our succour, and maketh intercession for vs with vnspakeable gronings, not that it in deede either praieth or Groneth but fluxeth vp in vs affiance, desires, and sighings, which the strength of nature were not able to conclude. And not without cause Paul calleth them vnspakeable gronings which fo the faithfull fend southe by the guiding of the spirite, because they which are truly exercised in praiers, are not ignorant that they bee so holden in perplexitie with blinde cares, that they fearcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea while they goe about to utter flammeting wordes they fliecke fast incumbered. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our owne flothfulnesse should giue over the charge of praying to the spirite of God, and lie dull in that carelesnesse, to which we are too much inclined.
there are heard the wicked sayings of some, that we must lie negligent the gaping to wait until he prevent our minds occupied elsewhere but rather that we loathing our owne slothfulness and flaggishness, should crave such help of the spirit. Neither doth Paul, when he biddeth vs to pray in spirit, therefore cease to exhort vs to wakefulness: meaning that the instinct of the spirit so vouch his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endeavours because God will in this behalfe prove how effectually faith moueth our hearts.

6 Let also another lawe be, that in praying we alway feelie our owne want, and that earnestly thinking how we stand in neede of those things that we aske, we joyne with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtaine. For many do slightly for manners fake recite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendered a certaine taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessarie remedy for their evils, because it is to their destruction to be without the help of God which they crave: yet it appeareth that they doe this dutie for custome, forasmuch as in the mean time their mindes are cold, and do not vey what they aske. The generall and confuse feeling indeede of their necessitie leadeth them hereunto: but it doth not stirre them as it were in a present case to aske releefe of their neede. Now what thinke we to be more hatefull or more detestable to God than this faining, when a man asketh forgiveness of sinnes, in the mean time either thinking that he is not a sinner, or not thinking vpon this that he is a sinner, even when with God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such peruersefoxesse (as I haue said) mankinde is full, that for manners sake they man times aske many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberallitie to come to them from other where, or that they have them alreadie remaining with them. The fault of some other seemeth to be lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which have onlie conceived this principle that we must sacrifice to God with prayers, do mumble vp prayers without any musing of minde vpon them. But the godly must principallly take heed, that they never come into the sight of God to aske any thing, but because they do both boyle with earnest affection of heart, and do therewith all desire to obtaine it of him. Yea, and also though in these things which we aske onely to the glory of God, we seeme not at the first sight to provide for our owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse ferventfoxesse and vehementnesse of desire. As when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) fervently hunger and thirst for that hallowing.

7 If any man obiect, that we are not alway druen with like necessitie to pray, I graunt the same indeede: and this difference is profitably taught vs of James: Is any man heste among you? Let him pray. Who lo is mine, let him finge. Therefore euyn common feeling teacheth vs, that because we are too slothfull, therefore, as the matter requireth we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this David calleth the first time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, fears, and other kinds of tentations do presse vs, so much freer access is open for vs, as though God did call vs vnto him. But yet no lesse true is that saying of Paul, that we must at all times: because how sooner things prosperously flow according to our hearts desire, and matter of mirth doeth compeste vs on euery side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our neede doth not exhort vs to pray. If a man haue abundance of wine and wheate; yet lest he cannot enjoy one mouthfull of bread but by the commonall grace of God, whole cellers or barnes full shall be no les why he should not crave daily bread. Now if we call to minde how many dangers do euery moment hang ouer vs, the very fear it selfe will teach vs that we haue no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceive in spirituall things. For, when shall so many sinnes, whereof we knowe our selves guilty, suffer vs to sit full without care and not in humblewise crave pardon both.

both of the fault and the paine? When doe tentations graunt vs truce, so that we need not to haft ynto help? Moreover the desire of the kingdom and glory of God ought so to plucke vs to it selfe, not by stites but continually, that it should alway be fit time for vs. Therefore not without cause we are so oft commanded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseverence in prayer, whereof mention shalbe made hereafter: but when the Scripture warneth vs that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slothfulness, because we doe not perceive how necessarie this care and diligence is for vs. By this rule all hypocristie and craftines of lying to God, is debarred, yea driven farre away from prayer. God promiseth that he will be neere to all them that call vpon him in truth, and he pronounces that they shal finde him which fecke him with their whole hart. But they aspire not thither which please themselves in their owne filthynes. Therefore a right prayer requireth Repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in the Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are accursed, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightfull that they finde the cares of God shu, which doe locke vp their owne harts, and that they shoule not finde God easie to bow, which doe with their owne hardnes prouoke his stiffeinesse. In Esay he threatneth after this manner. When yee that multiple your prayers, I will not heare you: for your hands are full of blood. Again in Jeremie: I haue cried and they haue refused to heare; they shall likewise erie, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most high diuonor, that wicked men shal boast of his covenent, which doe in all their life desile his holy name. Wherefore in Esay he complaineth that when the Jews come neere to him with their lips, their hart is farre from him. He speaketh not this of onely praiers, but affirmithe that he abhorreth faining in all the partes of worshipping him. To which purpose maketh that saying of James. Yee aske, and receive not: because yee aske ill, that yee may spend yt upon your pleasures. It is true in deed (as we shall againe shew a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly which they powre out, doe not rest upon their owne worthynesse: yet is not that admonition of John superfluous, if we aske any thing we shal receive it of him, because we keepe his commandements: forasmuch as an euill conscience shuteth the gate against vs. Whereupon foloweth that none doe rightlie pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore who soever preparreth himselfe to pray, let him be lothfull to himselfe in his owne erues, and (which cannot be done without Repentance) let him put on the person and minde of a begger.

8  Hereunto let the third rule be joyned, that who soever prepareth himselfe before God to pray, should for sake all conceit of his owne glory, put off all opinion of worthines, and finally give over all trauet of himselfe, giving in the abacing of himselfe the glory wholly to God: least if we take any thing be it never so little to our selves, we doe with our owne sweling fall away from his face. Of this submission which throweth downe all height, we have often examples in the feruants of God: among whom the holier that every one is, so much the more he is throwne downe when he commeth into the sight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himselfe commended with so great a tide of praise, said: We powre not our praiers before thee in our rightouenesse, but in thy grace mercy. Heare vs Lord, Lord be mercifull to vs: Heare vs, and do these things that we ask, For thine owne sake: because thy name is called vpon our the people and on thy holy place. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as men sometime speake) mingle himselfe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather severly confesseth his owne guiltinesse and humbly fleeth to the sanctuary of foruines, as he expressly saith: When I confessd my sins and the sins of my people. And this humblenesse David also teareth out with his owne example, when he saith, Enter not into judgement with thy feruant, because in thy sight every one that lieth shall not be justified. In such manner Esay praieth: Loe, thou art angrie because we have finned, the world is founded in thy waies; therefore we shalbe faiued:

And we have been all filled with uncleanness, and all our righteousness as a defiled cloth: and we have all withered away as a leaf, & our iniquities do scatter vs abroad as the wind: and there is none that calleth vpon thy name, that raiseth vp himselfe to take hold of thee: because thou haft hid thy face from vs, and haft made vs to pine away in the hand of our wickednes. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our fashioner, and we are the worke of thy hande. Be not anerie O Lord, neither remember wickednes for euer. Behold, looke vpon vs, we are a thy people. Lo, how they stand vpon no affiance at all, but vpon this only, that thinking vpon this that they be Gods, they despaire not that he will haue care of them. Likewise Jere.

If our iniquities answer against vs, doe thou for thy names sake. For it is both most truly & most holy written, of whomsoever it is, which being written by an unknowne author is fathered upn the Prophet Barne: A soule hauite and defolate for the greatnes of euill, crooked, and weake, a hunger soule, and fainting cies giue glorie to the O Lord. Not according to the righteousness of our fathers do we poure out prayers in thy sight, and ask mercie before thy face O Lord our God: but because thou art mercifull, have mercie vpon vs, because we have sinned before thee.

9. Finally the beginning and also the preparing of praying tightly, is cauing of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holiest man may obtaine any thing of God, vntill he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it possible that God may be favourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no maruell if the faithful doe with this key open to themselves the dore to pray. Which we leare out of many places of the Pialmes. For Dauid when he asketh another thing, faith: Remember not the finnes of my youth, remember me according to thy mercie for thy goodnesse sake O Lord. Again, Look vpon my affliction, and my labour, and giue all my finnes. Where we also see that it is not enough, if we euery euens faday do cast our selves to accound for our new finnes, if we do not also remember those finnes which might seem to have bin long ago forgotten. For, the same Prophet in another place, haueing confessd one saience offence by this occasion returneth euent to his mother wombe where he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lesse by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the finnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning himself, so much more easie he may finde God to entreat. But although the holy ones doe not alwaie in express words ask for forgiving of finnes, yet if we diligentely weigh their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shall easie finde that which I say, that they gathered a minde to pray of the onely mercy of God, and so alwaie tooke their beginning at appeaing: because if euery man examine his owne conscience, so farre is he from being holde to open his ears familierlie with God, that he trembleth at euery comming toward him, except that he standeth upn trust of mercy and pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they ask release of paines, that they also pray to have their finnes forgiven, because it was an absurdistie to will that the effect be taken away while the cause abide. For wee must beware that God be favourable vnto vs, before that he testifie his fauour with outward signes: because both he himselfe will keepe this order, and it should little profit vs to have him beneficall, vnlesse our conscience seeing him appeasd shoulde throughly make him louely vnto vs. Which we are also taught by the anfwer of Christ: For when he had decreed to heale the man sick of the Palsey, he said, Thy finnes are forgiven thee. shining vp our mindes therto by to that which is chiefly to be wished, that God first receive vs into fauour, and then shew forth the fruites of reconciliation in helping vs. But beside that speciall confession of present guiltines, whereby the faithful make supplication to obtaine pardon of euery speciall fault & paine, that generall præface, which procureth fauour to prayers, is never to be omitted, vnlesse they bee grounded vpna the freemercie of God, they shall hereafter obtaine any thing of God.
